Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has taken the position that he has just expressed. I believe the committee was fully justified in the action that it took. I believe it was well that the committee placed this provision in the bill. Of course, we all know that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, has the power to place the Army where he sees fit, at least within American territory. There may be some question whether the President has authority to send large detachments of our Army abroad in time of peace; but unquestionably the President has the right to send our troops to the Philippines, to Hawaii, and to the Canal Zone in such numbers as he deems wise. There is a very considerable question of policy involved in the matter of the size of the garrisons at these distant points, and it is the duty of Congress to establish or at least to suggest a policy. Congress is endeavoring to reduce the cost of the Military Establishment. Congress, at least the House, I think agrees with the committee. We do not need a division of troops on the Canal Zone, nor do we need a division of troops in the Philippines. There is some doubt as to whether we should maintain a full division of troops in Hawaii, important as that great outpost is. It seems to me it is not only within the jurisdiction of the Congress to limit appropriations for the maintenance of troops at distant points, but it would be well to do that if there were any serious question relative to the establishment and maintenance of a policy which the Congress did not approve. We do not any of us believe that the administration is disposed to maintain great forces at these outposts of the Republic, but it has been urged and reiterated that the reductions that were proposed were too great, both in numbers and in funds, and the committee sought to emphasize the propriety of its action and to demonstrate the fact that the reductions proposed can be made without seriously impairing the efficiency of the establishment by suggesting that smaller garrisons might well be maintained at these outposts than have been maintained, or than have been proposed by the General Staff. The thought, the view, and the purpose of the committee, as I understand it, in calling the attention of the country and of the Congress to the possibility of a reduction in numbers and in cost by the reduction of these overseas garrisons have been accomplished. The House is in harmony with the committee's view and purpose of reduction. We have every confidence that the War Department, having been advised of this view of the House that the overseas garrisons may be reduced, to the end that the expense of the establishment may be lowered, will give consideration to that view, as it should.

There is this difficulty confronting us, almost necessitating the action that the gentleman from Kansas has taken. Of course, in time of emergency, to be determined and declared by him, the President could send all of our troops to any of these points; but the very fact of the declaration of an emergency might be unfortunate. So that the committee having done an entirely proper thing to emphasize its view, the purpose of this emphasis having been accomplished, I think it is well that these limiting provisions should go out of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I have no objection whatever to the course fixed by the chairman of the subcommittee. I do feel, however, that the troops should be reduced in these foreign possessions. We are betraying absolutely no military secret when I say that the Secretary of War not only will say that the garrisons ought to be reduced in the foreign possessions but he expects to do that.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. As a matter of fact, in the last two or three days have not orders been issued to bring back the troops from Germany?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; an order has been issued, I think, that meets with the entire approval of Congress, to bring the troops back from Germany.

Mr. ROGERS. Is there any intimation that the Secretary of War approves the reduction to 5,000 troops in Hawaii?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that I am authorized to say specifically that that is the number he would agree to. I do not know whether it was the Secretary of War or some one else, but in an informal discussion connected with the War Department I had it fixed in my mind that they would not be averse to a reduction to 4,000 troops.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman perhaps refers to the statement of the Secretary of War in which he said that he would probably bring home practically all of the United States troops from the Philippines.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and also that he had no objection to a reduction of the force in Hawaii.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not recall that.

Mr. SISSON. That is my recollection of it. Some of the officers want to keep a full division in Hawaii, but I know the Secretary of War does not agree to that.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I simply wish to reiterate what the chairman of the committee has said, and call the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that the Secretary of War said there ought to be more troops in Hawaii than the 12,000 there now. As far as the hearing developed, there is not a word of suggestion that he does not think it would be grossly improper to reduce by one man the present force in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SISSON. I do not want to divulge any matter that may have been communicated to the committee, because in reference to certain matters the Secretary of War and General Pershing came before the subcommittee and discussed matters which they thought ought not to go into the hearing. I would not have objection myself to the world knowing all that was said, but because I am not a military expert I respect their wishes in the matter. Now, gentlemen of the committee, after all that is said on this matter I do not want to have it understood that I agree with the gentleman that Congress has no right to put this limitation in the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for one minute to yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand the gentleman to say, and I agree with him, that this provision that is now proposed to be stricken out is a wise and valid provision.

Mr. SISSON. That is my contention; yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And yet I understood the gentleman to say further that this provision should be stricken out?

Mr. SISSON. No; I did not say that. I said I had no objection to its being struck out on his request or motion. I would keep it in if I had my way about it. I only mean that I will not resist. I was interrupted when I wanted to give my reason for it, and that was that I feel sure from the conversations we have had and I have had personally with the Secretary that practically what the committee desired will be done.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Now there is a difference of opinion as to that. There are some gentlemen who say it will be done and some gentlemen who say it will not be done. Now if this is a wise provision, why should we not adopt the provision instead of eliminating it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Well, I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate be closed upon the section and amendments thereto.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. There is no last word.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. The chairman of the subcommittee was wise in agreeing to have stricken out of the bill the provision which seeks to dictate the size of the garrisons that shall be maintained in China, the Hawaiian Islands, at Panama, or on the Rhine. In my judgment it is not the province of the Committee on Appropriations to insert legislation in an appropriation bill which fixes a policy to be followed by the War Department.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing either the amendment or the paragraph under consideration. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to have debate with some time limit.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have not heretofore discussed this bill, not even for five minutes, and am entitled to be heard.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with it. The gentleman wants to open up again a subject that has been closed so that everybody else can talk on it. There may be 50 gentlemen wishing to talk on it and 49 be cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois presses his point of order, of course the Chair must sustain it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Arizona will proceed in order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to do so. The thought that I had in mind was perhaps not well expressed, so I shall restate it. The subject that I wished to develop, and which, I am sure, is entirely proper to discuss in connection with the paragraph under consideration, was the action taken by the Committee on Appropriations in attempting to adopt a policy as to the size of the Army. As I understand the rules of the House, the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction to report bills making appropriations authorized by law, but it has no authority to report legislation which, in this instance, seeks to dictate a policy as to the location of troops.

The military policy of the United States should be provided for in a bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which now has jurisdiction over all legislation relating to the Military Establishment except appropriations for its support. If this House desires to reduce the size of the Army from 150,000 men to 115,000, the right and proper way to go about it is to pass a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs fixing the enlisted personnel at the lesser number. But instead we find the Appropriations Committee usurping the jurisdiction of the Committee on Military Affairs by failing to provide funds to pay more than 115,000 enlisted men. And even worse than that, under the guise of a limitation the Appropriations Committee has sought to have the House direct where these soldiers shall be stationed.

I am opposed to this method of legislation. I have voted for every amendment offered to increase the sums appropriated for the pay of officers and enlisted men. I regret that these amendments were rejected, and I hope that when this bill is considered by the Senate that the full amount requested by the War Department and recommended by the Budget Bureau for an Army of 13,000 officers and 158,000 enlisted men will be restored to this bill. In my opinion this is the absolute minimum force that is necessary to care for the military posts and other Government property, police our insular possessions, and protect the Mexican border. By my vote no greater reduction in the Army shall be made.

Let me repeat that when Congress has established a military policy for the United States it is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to provide the funds necessary to maintain an Army in keeping with that policy. That committee has no right, by indirection, to assume a legislative authority which it does not possess. The House will not long abide any such usurpation, and the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. ANTHONY] has shown great wisdom in agreeing to the elimination of the provision which sought to limit the number of troops that may be stationed outside of the United States.

I hope that this will be a warning to the Committee on Appropriations that it must not attempt to dictate the military policy of the United States by reason of its control over appropriation bills. A continuation of such action in the future will surely result in having complete jurisdiction restored to the Committee on Military Affairs of all appropriations for the support of the Army and the other activities of the War Department.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Pursuant to the unanimous consent granted, the following observations are now here inserted.

The provision of the bill in question is:

> No part of the appropriations made herein for pay of the Army shall be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of troops garrisoned in China or for payment of more than 500 officers and enlisted men on the Continent of Europe; nor shall such appropriations be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Panama Canal Zone or more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Hawaiian Islands.

It is claimed by the proponents of the bill that this section is constitutional, while many of those who attack it claim that the provision is unconstitutional, and in support of the latter contention many authorities have been cited which appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The provision is nothing more than a limitation upon the purposes for which the fund in question can be used, and there is no language in the provision which can be construed in any way as a statement of legislative policy as to the various territories occupied by our military forces in China, Europe, the Panama Canal Zone, or the Hawaiian Islands.

The Constitution provides in Article I, section 8, that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies. Section 2 of Article II provides:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The only other provisions of the Constitution pertinent to the matter is section 9 of Article I, which provides in part:

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

The President is made by the Constitution Commander in Chief of the Army. As Commander in Chief he has control of the military forces of the Government and can direct their disposition and conduct in a general way. However, in every step he takes he must operate within the law of the land. The fact that he is Commander in Chief of the Army gives to him no right to determine matters of legislative policy. The President is an executive officer and executes the mandates of the people as expressed by the legislative branch of the Government. It seems to me that gentlemen, in discussing this question, have lost sight of the important principles that the President is given nothing by the Constitution which in any way detracts from the right of the people through their legislative branch to determine what its policy shall be and how it desires to have such policy executed.

In the case of Cross v. Harrison (16 Howard, 164 [193]) the Supreme Court was passing on questions arising from the occupation of the Territory of California after the close of the Mexican War and before a State government had been established. In that case it was said, among other things:

> The Territory had been ceded as a conquest, and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. That sovereignty was the United States, under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with the power also to admit new States into this Union, with only such limitations as are expressed in the section in which this power is given.

Again, in the same case, it was said:

> The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the Army and Navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done.

Again, in the case of the United States v. Castillero, 2 Black, page 2 (358), it was said:

> It is true that in the case in which these observations are made, the point to be determined was whether enemies' territory, which in the course of hostilities had come into our military possession, became a part of the United States and subject to our general laws. But they are important to this case as defining the power of the President in war to be merely that of the military Commander in Chief; that territory can be acquired only by the treaty making and legislative authority, and, consequently, that the fact that hostilities are by the military authority directed against a particular portion of the enemy's territory, can not be said to make the acquisition of that territory the object of the war.

This also was a case arising out of the conquest of foreign territory in the War with Mexico.

The section of the bill in question deals with territory outside of the United States, and in the case of China and the Continent of Europe, has to do with territory over which the United States has no claims of any kind except such rights of occupation as may exist by virtue of treaties now existing between the United States and the Governments of the occupied territories. It may well be doubted whether a different rule does not apply to the occupation of territory within continental United States and territory which is outside continental United States, and occupied for some temporary purpose by military forces of the United States. While it would stand to reason that the President has ample authority to direct the transfer of military forces from one post or station to another in continental United States in his discretion, and where no contrary policy has been declared by Congress, it does not follow that the same may be true as to the occupation of foreign territory.

Even in the continental United States troops are called and moved by the President in times of emergency by virtue of an act of Congress passed in the very early days of the Republic. It was under this act of Congress that President Lincoln called for volunteers during the Civil War, and under which act many troop movements have been directed by the President since that time in matters originating within the continental United States. It is obvious that any occupation of foreign territory by United States troops in times of peace must be by express authority of the Congress, or in carrying out a policy which has been expressed by an act of Congress.

During the administration of President Wilson, military forces of the United States were sent, on at least two occasions, into Mexico, where combats were had with military forces in that country. It may well be doubted whether any constitutional authority existed to support this action. No declaration of war had been made and no congressional policy authorized such course. In the same way an occupation by the President of territory in foreign countries by the military forces of the United States is absolutely without authority unless in pursuance to some policy indicated by Congress.

Following the principles announced in the above cases, no reason exists why Congress might not, by the passage of proper acts, cause the entire abandonment by our military forces of every portion of the lands occupied in China, the Continent of Europe, the Panama Canal Zone, and the Hawaiian Islands. With this policy the President has nothing to do. It is his duty to have charge of the operations of the Army in pursuance to the general policy Congress has expressed. Congress, of course, is nothing more than the expression of the voice of the people as to policy, a right which the people have not granted away by any constitutional provision.

As has been noted, the Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. The Congress has full and complete authority over the purse strings of the Government, and can appropriate moneys for certain constitutional purposes or refuse to appropriate the same as it desires. Hence it may be that just and legal claims against the United States may be entirely avoided by the failure of Congress to make the necessary appropriations. This may at times go so far as to amount to a repudiation of the obligations of the Government to other nations.

An illustration of the power of the Congress over appropriations is found in Hart's case, One hundred and eighteenth United States, 62. In that case Hart, who had been formerly engaged in the rebellion of 1861, had a claim for compensation against the Government of the United States. In November, 1865, he was granted a full and complete pardon by the President of the United States. Congress, by an act approved March 2, 1867, provided that no person engaged in the said rebellion might have any valid claim against the Government of the United States which existed prior to April 13, 1861. The Supreme Court held, on the pleading of this statute, that Hart, irrespective of the action of the President, had no valid claim, Congress having definitely determined the policy in that respect.

I think there is no particular difference of views as to the power of Congress in this respect. Even the authority cited by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON], Pomeroy on International Law, states the law clearly, as quoted on page 4296 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 22:

> As Congress is to make all appropriations, it may declare the specific purpose for which money is to be used.

There can be no doubt as to this general proposition.

However, this further limitation on the doctrine must be admitted. Where Congress has directed a certain policy, and the President, in pursuance of that policy, finds it necessary to utilize military forces in a certain way and thus incurs expense, it must be admitted that such expense would be a proper and legitimate charge upon the Treasury of the United States, and should be paid by proper deficiency appropriations.

In Sixth Opinions of Attorney General, 28, the following is said:

> But when the Constitution of the United States, or any act of Congress, authorizes and requires the President to do a thing which involves the expenditure of public money, then, and in such case, the legality of an engagement of the President to have the thing done—that is, of a contract for its performance—is wholly independent of the question whether there is or is not an adequate appropriation by Congress for the object.

My conclusion from such investigations as I have made of the subject leads me to believe that there is ample authority in Congress to enact the provision in question, and that if enacted into law it would be valid and constitutional. I am also as fully convinced that Congress has the right to declare in express terms either the abandonment of any of the territory in question or to make any other provision relative to its occupation by military forces or otherwise as it may desire to do. Whether it has done so in the case of the territory in question in this bill is a question to be determined by the acts of Congress relating to those particular subjects. If such occupation of these countries is not in pursuance to any law of the land or policy expressed by Congress, then the President should, if well advised, withdraw such armed forces at once. If, however, the occupation is in pursuance of some congressional policy, I am as thoroughly convinced that the Congress of the United States should and will make adequate provision for necessary expenses incurred.

Waiving the constitutionality of the section in question, I am convinced that this provision in this bill is absolutely ill-advised. The President of the United States must be trusted with some discretion in these matters. He is presumed to be acting within his constitutional limitations. Nothing has been made to appear to this committee that he is doing otherwise, nor has any such claim been made. He has every source of information available to him. The State Department and the other departments of the Government inform him from time to time thoroughly as to the necessities of our Government and the steps that should be taken for the preservation of the life and property of our citizens. He has full knowledge of the treaty obligations of our Government. On these matters Congress is not, nor is the Appropriations Committee, fully advised. The President is presumed to know more about these matters than we do. So far as I am personally concerned, I feel constrained to believe that he ought to be given great latitude in his course of action in these matters. I am sure the provision in the bill was written with good intentions, but I am as sure that it is unwise. There never was a time when our foreign relations were in a more delicate condition than now. Just what is needed is unknown to most of us, and conditions change from day to day. To hamstring the presidential authority is unwise. Nothing has appeared to this committee which would lead one to believe that the Chief Executive needs to be conducted by leading strings in what he does in these matters. I, for one, am opposed to any such provision in any bill at this time and am pleased that the committee has yielded to what is obviously the overwhelming sentiment of the House and has eliminated this undesirable provision.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of postmasters.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILEAGE OF THE ARMY.

For mileage to commissioned officers, warrant officers, members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, contract surgeons, expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, Army field clerks and field clerks of the Quartermaster Corps, when authorized by law, $1,100,000.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret exceedingly that I can not agree with the committee on all the provisions contained in this bill.

A committee having charge of legislation has the right, of course, to expect Members of the House to at least give careful consideration to recommendations made by it, especially when that committee has had the opportunity to study the questions and ascertain the facts about matters pertaining to the particular legislation proposed, and I regret to find myself opposed to the committee as regards certain provisions of the bill.

In the first place, I think it was a grave mistake to make such a drastic cut in our Army. The only reason advanced for the decrease in the size of the Army was that of economy. I am as much in favor of economy as any Member on the floor of this House, but I believe that such a weakening of the national defense as was proposed and carried in this bill is a false economy, which may prove in the end to be disastrous to our national safety. I believe, of course, that we ought to settle upon a definite military policy and provide for an Army large enough to command respect in peace time, and with a force of trained officers sufficiently large to readily prepare and train a citizen army should occasion demand. Feeling as I do about the matter, I heartily indorsed the Kahn amendment, increasing the size of the Army from 115,000 to 150,000, and the number of trained officers from 11,000 to 13,000.

But the immediate matter under consideration is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] to strike out the paragraph near the bottom of page 22, beginning with line 20, as follows:

No part of the appropriations made herein for pay of the Army shall be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of troops garrisoned in China or for payment of more than 500 officers and enlisted men on the Continent of Europe; nor shall such appropriations be used, except in time of emergency, for the payment of more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Panama Canal Zone or more than 5,000 enlisted men in the Hawaiian Islands.

The enactment of this provision would constitute an undertaking on the part of Congress to regulate the distribution of the Army, a power heretofore exercised only by the President of the United States under his constitutional appointment as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces. This is the first time in the history of the country, so far as I know, where Congress has ever attempted to take away from the President the right to allocate the troops in the Army or the Navy. The only precedent for such legislation, if it could be called a precedent, is found in section 2 of an act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States." That section of that act divided the Southern States into military districts, and required that each district be placed under the command of a general officer, and expressly made it the duty of the President to detail a sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority. Of course, we know that this act was born of a bitter political and personal hostility to the President, and was designed to thwart his power; yet, even under that act, the number of troops that he was directed to detail to such districts was left entirely to the President's own discretion. It prescribed neither a minimum nor a maximum that the President might in his discretion assign to one place or to another for the safety and welfare of the country. This provision, which we seek to eliminate by this amendment, directs the President in the number of troops he can detail to the Panama Canal Zone, or to the Hawaiian Islands, or in China, or on the Continent of Europe. It absolutely takes away from the Chief Executive the right given him under the Constitution, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, to distribute the Army for the protection of our citizens and for the safety and welfare of the country.

On one other occasion, and one only, a similar provision to the act of March 2, 1867, was considered. This was on the 5th of April, 1917, when the House of Representatives had before it a resolution declaring the existence of a state of war with Germany, when an amendment was offered prohibiting the ordering of troops to land duty in Europe until so directed by act of Congress. This amendment received no support, and in speaking on this amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] used these words:

Of course, we give the President power to use the Army and the Navy. You can not very well restrict his power or cripple him by legislative provision.

If this provision stays in the bill, and the President is prohibited from stationing troops in China, it would prevent the maintenance of a proper, or, in fact, any policy in our foreign relations, because it ignores any agreement the President or any former Presidents may have made with other nations for our and their mutual safety and benefits. Moreover, as has been said, it is an announcement to the world that the United States has no legal and responsible agent with which it may treat as to matters of international peace and concord.

I think that the provisions in this paragraph, especially relating to Hawaii and Panama, are very dangerous. These territories are as much entitled to protection as the District of Columbia. Indeed, they are as much a part of the United States as the District of Columbia. They are two great outposts against attack upon our shores. If war should be made upon us, these must be held at all hazards. Sufficient garrisons should be maintained in those places so that in the event of the breaking out of war they may be defended against a sudden naval attack; but you answer me and say, "We are at peace; where is any danger?" There may be no danger now, but I hesitate to say that the millennium has arrived. Wars come without warning. Can we not trust the President of the United States in the handling or disposition of the Army and the Navy? What has happened recently that the committee should feel that Congress ought no longer trust the President and the Secretary of War in the handling of our troops? We have trusted our Presidents, 25 in number, for more than 125 years. Are we going to say that the present Executive is not worthy of our trust? But, you say, the bill provides that in cases of emergency the President shall have unlimited power in the disposition of the Army. If this bill should become a law with this provision in it, would not the sudden dispatch of troops announce to the world, and especially to any nation contemplating an attack upon us, that the United States regarded war as imminent, and might not this very thing bring on a war which might otherwise be averted? Surely this Congress will not say to the world that we can not trust the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, the President of the United States. I hope that this amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$1,100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,100,005."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 23, line 9, strike out "$1,100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,100,005."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary for me to say that I offer this amendment merely for the purpose of gaining the floor at this time in discussing the right of Congress to control these appropriations. In making this particular provision Congress has exercised its right to control appropriations which limit the size of the Army. My particular purpose, however, in rising at this time was because I saw some statements in the RECORD a few days ago, I think day before yesterday, which I think under no circumstances ought to be permitted to go unchallenged. Those statements related to the power of Congress with reference to so controlling appropriations as to affect directly the policy of this country in military activities and, in fact and effect, to fix the point where troops, a portion of the Army, should be stationed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I make the point of no quorum. It is something I have not done before. I have not spoken here on this bill and taken up any of the time on it.

Mr. MANN. There are Members who wish to speak on this subject just as much as does the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have no doubt about that, and they ought to be permitted to do so. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [The Chair proceeded to count.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I withdraw the point of no quorum. Mr. Chairman, I have made some study, not only of the Constitution of this country but also of the constitution of England. The Constitution of this country was framed, so far as it related to the control of the Army and Navy, largely upon the principles that govern the constitution of England. The constitution of England, of course, as the Members are aware, is not a written constitution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the constitution of England has nothing to do with increasing this amount by $5, as suggested by the gentleman's amendment, and the gentleman ought to abide by the rules of the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman ought not to be so captious. I usually yield to my distinguished friend from Illinois. I think this is the first time in 10 years that I have not, but I think on this particular occasion that my friend is somewhat exceeding that authority which he exercises over us in view of his distinguished services.

Mr. MANN. I make the point that that is not discussing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum, to show that there is no time being saved by this kind of procedure. I could have concluded in the time which will be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen gentlemen are present, a quorum.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "Army" on page 23, line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Page 23, line 7, strike out the word "Army."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is withdrawn.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, under the Constitution of the United States the command of the Army is lodged in the President. Under the policy of the subcommittee on appropriations the Commander in Chief of the Army is the ranking Republican member of that subcommittee. It has been urged here, and correctly so, that Congress may refuse to make any appropriation whatever for an army in China, in Germany, or elsewhere. Why, of course, Congress can refuse appropriations if it so desires, but the spirit of the Constitution is that after the Congress has fixed the size of the Army the President of the United States under the Constitution has the right to say where that Army shall be.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am moving to strike out the word "Army," Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is pressed, of course the Chair would have to rule that inasmuch as this paragraph relates to mileage and payment of officers the point of order is well taken.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I suggest to the Chair that mileage certainly refers as to where we shall send these soldiers and officers. It takes mileage to get them to China and Germany, and it takes mileage to get them home.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I can not yield now, because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is on the floor.

Mr. MANN. If the committee wants to agree to have Members discuss that item, I have no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The House agrees, if the gentleman from Illinois will not object. I know the gentleman from Illinois is a large part of the House, but he is not all of it.

Mr. MANN. I have had a speech on this subject in my system for days and I can not get rid of it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say, in deference to the gentleman from Illinois, I was not on the floor the other day when this matter was discussed and did not have an opportunity to express myself, and while I know the gentleman is full of this subject I would be perfectly willing to excuse him for a few minutes until I conclude my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Doubtless the rest of us would like to get out while the gentleman is talking. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois he is at perfect liberty to do so, because I do not expect either to convince or to persuade him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES TO AND LOSS OF PRIVATE PROPERTY.

For payment of claims of not to exceed $500 in amount for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army that have accrued, or may hereafter accrue, from time to time, $50,000: Provided, That settlement of such claims shall be made by the General Accounting Office, upon the approval and recommendation of the Secretary of War, where the amount of damages has been ascertained by the War Department, and payment thereof will be accepted by the owners of the property in full satisfaction of such damages.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRAGO. I would like to go back to that language as to mileage for the Army and ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question or two. I notice the item for mileage is $1,100,000. As I understand it, the Budget Bureau and the Secretary of War asked for about $2,000,000 for that item.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. CRAGO. And the Secretary of War, I believe, added $500,000 to that to call the R. O. T. into training.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the reserve officers.

Mr. CRAGO. I would like to ask the gentleman if the amount appropriated here, $1,100,000, contemplates the calling in of the R. O. T. in training?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman refers to reserve officers?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The committee does not contemplate calling any of those into the service.

Mr. CRAGO. Then this item will not provide any transportation for that purpose?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; only for the Regular Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee whether, in the course of the discussion in the hearings or otherwise, there was brought to the attention of the committee the ruling of the comptroller that kept the mileage back from the families of Regular officers under certain conditions, such as delay in reaching the post on details involving change of station.

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have in mind this situation, which has been brought to my attention by several officers, and it is manifestly unjust. Under the law when an officer is directed to change stations a certain allowance is made to his family to change with him. In this case a considerable number of officers were directed to change stations, and they changed stations, but were told at the time that there were not then sufficient accommodations for their families, and that they themselves would have to subsist at the post as bachelor officers until later, when the department would notify them that their families could join them. Later on, when their families did join them, they were told that their families had not joined them within a reasonable time, and that therefore the mileage allowance for their families could not be given.

Mr. MANN. That is for the Committee on Military Affairs to act upon.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; and between these two stools something is coming to the ground.

Mr. MANN. We can not affect the rulings of the comptroller by this legislation.

Mr. ANTHONY. The hearings show that there will be about $1,200,000 expended for mileage during the current year, and the committee thought that the appropriation of $1,100,000 would cover it, considering the reduction in the size of the Army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not questioning the size of the appropriation, but I was wondering as to what would be done in regard to this allowance for the transportation of their families.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee did have some discussion before it about the necessity of enlarging the scope of the provision for the transportation of dependents of officers, but did not go into that. Of course, we could not go into it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Some mileage has been withheld under the technical construction of the comptroller that because the families did not join the officers on changing stations within a month they did not join them within a reasonable time and therefore were not entitled to allowance for travel. The families did not join the officers because the department told them not to.

Mr. ANTHONY. They will have a balance of something over $600,000 out of the appropriation for this year.

Mr. CRAGO. The allowance for families was in the temporary increase which we granted to the officers, but that was permanent law.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. MILLS. Referring to the question of mileage, do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to say that the committee does not contemplate any training for reserve officers this summer?

Mr. ANTHONY. No training for reserve officers except a certain number provided under the appropriation of $250,000.

Mr. MILLS. That is only for the pay.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. This item of $1,100,000 could be used for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS. I understood the gentleman to answer a previous question to the effect that the whole $1,100,000 was intended for the purposes of the Regular Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was the intention, but the department can use it for reserve officers.

Mr. MILLS. I know, but the committee has so appropriated for the Regular Army that it makes no provision for mileage for the reserve officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; we thought the expense would be so great that we would not embark on it this year.

Mr. MILLS. Then the gentleman's committee resolved not to provide for any training of reserve officers?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; out of this appropriation——

Mr. MILLS. They can walk to camp. The gentleman has just stated that this is just sufficient for the purposes of the Regular Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. There is a surplus now of $659,000 in the money appropriated for the current year, so that it looks as if they had plenty of money.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments are withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Regular supplies of the Army: Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection; construction and repair of military reservation fences; stoves and heating apparatus required for the use of the Army for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts in the field and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; and the necessary power for the operation of moving-picture machines; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, and enlisted men, warrant officers, and field clerks, including enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts; for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, and buildings for a similar purpose on military reservations authorized by War Department regulations; for sale to officers, and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and officers at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; materials for cleaning and preserving ordnance and ordnance stores; for cold storage; for the construction and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; authorized issues of soap, toilet paper, and towels; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries, and for schools for noncommissioned officers; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; for purchase of relief maps for issue to organizations, commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; for forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry and batteries of Artillery, and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted; for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and for labor and expenses incident thereto, including, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, the cost of irrigation; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange of same, including blank books and blank forms for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports, $10,932,000: Provided, That from this appropriation not to exceed $850,000 shall be expended for the pay of civilian employees; not to exceed $1,250,000 shall be expended for power, heat, and electric current; not to exceed $57,000 shall be expended for maintenance and repair of buildings (including repair of machinery) for laundries; not to exceed $225,000 shall be expended for the maintenance and repair of heating apparatus (other than stoves); not to exceed $175,000 for maintenance and repair of electric wiring and fixtures; not to exceed $15,000 for the repair and exchange of typewriters; not to exceed $3,000,000 for fuel; not to exceed $4,000,000 for forage, including salt and vinegar and bedding for animals, and straw for soldiers' bedding; not to exceed $175,000 for ice; and not to exceed $125,000 shall be expended for stationery: Provided further, That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to sell as soon as possible after the approval of this act, upon such terms and under such conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the best interests of the Government, such horses and mules now being held at remount stations and posts or with organizations of the National Guard or units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps as are not in actual use.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee about the item of $10,932,000. The estimate there was $12,292,755. Now, in that item you have specified that not to exceed $850,000 shall be expended for the pay of civilian employees. I will ask the gentleman if he is contemplating a reduction in the number of civilian employees on the transports and such other activities as the Army might have?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not cover the transport service, but it covers activities of the Army where civilians are employed in connection with this particular item. For the current year there was $1,600,000 used out of this appropriation for civilian employees. In the estimates for next year they planned to use $932,000, which is almost half the amount they used for the current year for civilian employees, but on the basis of the general reduction which we made in the size of the Army the committee reduced the amount for civilian employees to $850,000, about in proportion.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that if he is satisfied that is a sufficient appropriation I am satisfied, because I am in thorough sympathy with the idea of reducing the civilian employees wherever possible and using the men in the Army for as much of the work as possible. I think it is a sad commentary on the efficiency of the Army that they need so many civilian employees.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course, this affects the entire question of civilian employees in the Army as a whole, and I know the gentleman realizes that there has been great progress made by the War Department in reducing the number of civilian employees during the current year. I think when Secretary Weeks started in at the War Department there were over 80,000 civilian employees in the Army, and to the credit of the War Department and their efforts for economy it should be said that the number of civilian employees has been reduced to approximately 50,000, which shows that the Army is steadily getting rid of its unnecessary civilian employees. This appropriation is limited about in proportion to the reductions that have been made, and as the committee figured they would be made during the next fiscal year.

Mr. CRAGO. I suppose you have taken into consideration the fact that they are gradually getting rid of a great many of the surplus stores, and so forth, and that because of this the number of civilian employees can be reduced?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true, and in other parts of the bill we are providing additional amounts of money to enable the different bureaus to consolidate their storehouses. Where they have, for instance, from a dozen to 30 storehouses scattered over the country, we are giving them the money and the labor to consolidate those storehouses into two or three, where the stores can be taken care of more economically.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not want to see the committee cripple the transport service that has been built up and that would be difficult to replace once it is destroyed.

Mr. MANN. Did not the President recently recommend that the Army transport service be abandoned?

Mr. CRAGO. I do not agree with the President in that. Sometimes we may differ, you know.

Mr. LINEBERGER. He recommended that the transport service be reduced.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee of the Whole ought to have the benefit of some very interesting figures that were developed in the hearings with regard to the transport service. When the question of bringing back some of the troops from Germany was brought up a few months ago, the Shipping Board were very desirous of having the job; so they were asked by Executive authority to prepare an estimate and submit a bid as to what they would charge for bringing these troops back. The figures are very interesting. The contract was not given to the Shipping Board, but the troops were brought back by the vessels of the Army transport service, and the Army transport service brought them for less than half the amount of the bid submitted by the Shipping Board, showing that the Army transport service is not only efficiently operated but economically operated.

The cost to bring this lot of troops back from Germany in Army transports was $958,470. Bids were asked from the commercial lines—Shipping Board vessels—and they bid $2,212,000 for that work. The commercial lines were the Shipping Board vessels.

Mr. McKENZIE. Of course, the gentleman will understand, I take it, that the turning over of the Army transports to the Shipping Board is a part of the subsidy scheme that is intended to have the Government pay more for transporting troops and supplies than we have to pay now, and it is justified as a subsidy to the Shipping Board.

But that is not the question I wanted to ask. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] knows that I have always joined with him and others on the Committee on Military Affairs in an effort to rid the Army of the great number of civilian employees who have been engaged by the War Department. But I want to ask the gentleman what connection there is or can be between the reduction of the commissioned personnel and the enlisted force of the Army and the reduction of the civilian employees? I do not get that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Simply because the activities of supplying 115,000 troops are much less and require much less civilian help than would be required to feed and supply 150,000 men.

Mr. MANN. That is, if 10 men are required to wait on 13 it will not require 10 men to wait on 9.

Mr. ANTHONY. A large number of civilians are employed to do the actual labor in the Army; for instance, nearly every pound of freight and most of the labor around our military posts is handled by civilians. About all the labor that a soldier does in connection with subsistence, for instance, is to raise the food from his plate to his mouth. Civilians do the rest.

Mr. McKENZIE. I asked this question simply to have it appear in the RECORD that so far as I am personally concerned I prefer to keep a larger number of enlisted soldiers in the Army and cut down the civilian employees, believing that it is better preparedness than to cut down the enlisted personnel and go on with a large force of civilians.

Mr. ANTHONY. In other words, the gentleman thinks it might be possible to get a certain amount of work out of the soldiers?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the efforts in that line have not been productive of very good results in the Army. It is often very difficult to train the Army and keep it in condition and in active training and do the necessary military work, and then in addition to try to do other things. It does not leave them much time.

Mr. CRAGO. The other work really applies to the Army. They should be self-sustaining and self-supporting.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and also the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] will agree with me that many of the activities in the Army to-day now performed by civilian employees, such as vocational training and all the other things that have been brought in by reformers from the outside who want to have a bloodless army and a reform army and to have soldiers educated in everything except fighting, is responsible for that condition of affairs and not the military men of our country. I think that should be said in justice to the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. For the purpose of getting the number of civilians into the RECORD I want to present these figures: On December 31, 1920, there were 92,798, of which number 19,000 were engaged in civil work, largely river and harbor work. On December 31, 1921, a year later, there were 49,534, of which 12,231 were employed on the civil work.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I desire to ask the chairman of the subcommittee in reference to line 17, page 30, the item not to exceed $4,000,000 for forage. As I understand, that is the amount the War Department asked for.

Mr. ANTHONY. They asked for $4,475,553, but in consideration of the fact that the price of forage is considerably less than a year ago we shaved the amount a little.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman state how many animals that is intended to take care of?

Mr. ANTHONY. The number of animals in the Regular Army is at present 57,000.

The Clerk read the paragraph for the transportation of the Army and its supplies, beginning on page 33, line 8, and ending on page 37, line 9.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 36, line 17, I move to strike out the sum of $16,000,000 and insert $14,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 36, line 17, strike out $16,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $14,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion more in the nature of a pro forma amendment than otherwise because it brings up the question that I was attempting to discuss a short time ago. It is obvious that if my motion prevailed it would restrict the transportation of troops in this country to the Philippines and other foreign regions, and the question arises in connection with the motion I made as to the propriety of it under the constitutional right of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, various claims have been made as to the rights of this body, and no more serious question can come before it than the question of the extent of those rights. If I correctly understand, some gentlemen in discussing this question a few days ago intimated that Congress had no right to restrict the transportation of troops to foreign lands in any such way as to determine the policy of keeping them in those lands. It was also held by some gentlemen that Congress had no right to restrict the appropriation made for the Army so as to determine the policy of the size of the Army and the number of the personnel thereof.

Mr. Chairman, the framers of the Constitution of this country in respect to the control over the Army and the Navy followed the doctrines that had so long prevailed. The constitution of England is not a written constitution but is determined by the action taken by the English Parliament and the decisions of the courts of England. No one who reads the history of England going back for 200 or 300 or 400 years will fail to see that there was for years a struggle between Parliament and the King as to whether Parliament had the power to control the policy of the nation in relation to the Army and the Navy by restrictions in making appropriations, and it was long ago settled beyond any further dispute that Parliament had such power. I am aware that some gentleman said on the floor the other day that that was not the case in England. Gentlemen who make such statements should be more careful, for they certainly have not read the parliamentary debates. If they would read the parliamentary debates even to the present day they would recognize that although the King has the power to direct the movements of troops, no one claims that it is an infringement of the constitutional right for Parliament to restrict such control by limiting the appropriations.

The King of England controls the movements of the army and the navy in the same way that the President of the United States does here. There is not in my opinion any more sacred right vested by the Constitution in Congress than the right to control the Army and Navy through control of the appropriations. The moment this right is abandoned—and some gentlemen seem to think it ought to be abandoned—the moment this right is abandoned the liberty of the country is lost. It is true that nothing has so far occurred showing a disposition on the part of any President to abuse his powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; but that is not the question. The question is whether, if this right belongs in Congress, it should be sacredly preserved and kept as a precaution against some improper person who might by some chance in the future occupy the presidential chair.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman recognize a distinction between Great Britain and the United States in the power of the Executive? In Great Britain the King is nominally the head and acts only on the advice of the Prime Minister, who is the leader of the majority party and in control of Parliament.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know that there is any difference so far as the matter I have been discussing is concerned. The King is the absolute commander of the army and the navy in England, the same as the President of the United States is in this country.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman mean to convey the idea to the House that the King has the right under the constitution of England to dispose of the army, disregarding the wishes of the Prime Minister?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The King of England, as the gentleman is aware, theoretically, can do no wrong. If any wrong is committed, it is a wrong committed by his ministers. That is all theory. As a matter of fact, of course, Kings of England have done wrong, and, as a matter of fact, they can not absolutely control the army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HORSES FOR CAVALRY, ARTILLERY, ENGINEERS, AND SO FORTH.

For the purchase of horses of ages, sex, and size as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts for officers entitled to public mounts for the Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Engineers, the United States Military Academy, service schools, and staff colleges, and for the Indian Scouts, and for such Infantry and members of the Medical Department in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto (including $25,000 for purchase of remounts, and $150,000 for encouragement of the breeding of riding horses suitable for the Army, including cooperation with the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, and for the purchase of animals for breeding purposes and their maintenance), $180,000: Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provisions for remounts, and unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of War no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, within a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of any horse below the standard set by Army Regulations for Cavalry and Artillery horses, except when purchased as remounts or for instruction of cadets at the United States Military Academy: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for polo ponies except for West Point Military Academy, and such ponies shall not be used at any other place: And provided further, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, accept donations of animals for breeding and donations of money or other property to be used as prizes or awards at agricultural fairs, horse shows, and similar exhibitions, in order to encourage the breeding of riding horses suitable for Army purposes: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a statement of all expenditures under this appropriation, and full particulars of means adopted and carried into effect for the encouragement of the breeding of riding horses suitable for the military service.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Page 28, line 11, after the word "maintenance" strike out "$180,000" and insert "$296,257."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a brief statement about this, and then ask a question of the committee. The department asked for $296,257 for this item. The effect of this reduction will be to curtail Cavalry activities for the coming year. The item of $180,000 for the purchase of horses, and so forth, includes $150,000 for the encouragement of breeding, which should under no circumstances be reduced. This leaves $30,000 for the purchase of animals. There are at present 25,000 riding horses on hand, notwithstanding the fact that approximately 34,000 are actually required for an Army of 150,000 men. The number authorized for the Cavalry is 11,364. The proportional Cavalry replacement of 175 horses would amount to 80 horses, or seven one-hundredths per cent. A replacement of 5 per cent, which is a low estimate of minimum requirements, amounts to 568 animals for the Cavalry alone. That is about 393 more remounts than are allowed for the entire Army. The reduced appropriation will not take care of the Cavalry school alone. I want to ask in reference to this matter if the general reduction of the Army, which already has been agreed to by the committee, from the present strength will approximately reduce the estimate asked for by the War Department in order to allow a full supply for Cavalry? If that is the case, I shall withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee in arriving at its estimate did not provide to any great amount for the purchase of additional horses or mules for the Military Establishment during the coming year. On July 1 of last year there were 39,000 horses and some forty-five thousand and odd mules in the control of the department. At the present time there are 34,700 horses. It has not been the policy of the War Department to dispose of any of the Cavalry horses, even though there is no present need for them. In response to an inquiry by the chairman of the subcommittee as to whether the reduction in the size of the Army would not have its effect in the reduction of this estimate, the officer testifying on this item stated that it would. We have in this bill reduced the srength of the Army. It is not determined whether there will be a proportionate corresponding reduction in all arms of the service as there was last year. That is General Pershing's testimony before our committee. We do not seek in any wise to curtail the number of horses that are now in the service. It is our policy to have the department retain those now in the service for their present and coming uses. So this item is based on the idea that there will not be much need for the purchase of additional horses or mules during the coming year, and for us to give the estimate originally proposed would be merely cumulative and rather wasteful.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, in other words, the reduction which has been agreed on will make available the necessary horses for the Cavalry.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; that is the way I understand it.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. This is the item that provides the appropriation for the purchase of stallions for improving the breed of horses to be used in the Army, as I understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the item that provides for the taking over of the horses originally under the control of the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, now under the control of the War Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can the gentleman tell us how many horses have been donated to the War Department under this law?

Mr. STAFFORD. As I recall the testimony, the number is in the neighborhood of 80.

Mr. McKENZIE. Donated?

Mr. STAFFORD. Donated to the War Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can the gentleman tell us whether there have been any horses imported from foreign countries that would tend to improve the breed?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not say whether any have been imported, but the department has purchased 120 within the last year or so in order to improve the breed.

Mr. McKENZIE. What is the entire number now owned by the War Department for this purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. The number under the direct supervision of the War Department is 200.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can the gentleman tell us how these horses are handled and what expense it is to the Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am rather surprised that my good friend should catechise me so minutely on this proposition. I recall that he was a member of a committee of three that made a report to the House on this very subject recently. I read that report. It is true that the gentleman was a minority of one who presented adverse views. I would not charge the gentleman from Illinois with aphasia or absent-mindedness, because his actions testify so frequently to his wonderful retentive memory. Unless he merely wishes to refresh his recollection, I can see no special reason for all this minutiæ of detail.

Mr. McKENZIE. I know the gentleman from Wisconsin has the information, and I merely wanted to get it into the RECORD for the benefit of the people of the country, so that they may know just what is going on in the War Department along this line.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know the gentleman is a very busy member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it can not be expected, even with such an industrious member, that he would have time to read the very voluminous hearings of the Committee on Appropriations that cover this subject, even this one item in which his heart is so wrapped up.

The gentleman will find, page 600 of the hearings, testimony as to the way this service is operated at the present time by the War Department.

Mr. McKENZINE. Just tell us briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY POSTS.

For the construction and enlargement at military posts of such buildings as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary, including all appurtenances thereto, $916,000, including $400,000 for continuing construction of post at Camp Benning, Ga.; $55,000 for construction of one hospital ward at Letterman General Hospital, San Francisco, Calif.; $262,000 for general construction at Camps Dix, Meade, and Lewis; and $198,000 for continuing construction and enlargement of barracks for guards at the United States disciplinary barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I move to strike out the last word. I do it for the purpose of calling attention to a matter that is vital to a portion of my district, the people along the border. Mr.

Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I note in the hearings where my friend General Harbord testified and was interrogated by the gentleman from Mississippi relative to the border patrol. I want to state to the committee I voted against the amendment of my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to reduce the enlisted strength of the Army to 100,000 for the reason that I think we ought to keep the Army at its present strength, so that it will be an adequate and sufficient force to properly police this country and its dependencies. Now, I note where General Harbord, whom I esteem very highly as a man and as an Army official, stated that he was in favor of withdrawing the border patrol, concentrating the troops in large part in posts in the interior, I take it. My friend from Mississippi asked him who was responsible for the present border patrol, which I think has done splendid work in protecting the lives and property of our citizens from Mexican bandits and marauders. Now, I want to state to you, gentlemen, that there are six Congressmen who represent the entire border line of this country between us and Mexico—3,600 miles—myself, my colleagues, Mr. GARNER, Mr. WURZBACH, Mr. MONTOYA, of New Mexico, Mr. HAYDEN, of Arizona, and Mr. SWING, of California. Take the border I represent, 800 miles. I want to ask my good friend from Mississippi if he has ever been in the Big Bend of Texas, a scope of territory there of about 400 or 500 miles, extending from the east part of Hudspeth County to the western part of Val Verde County, a distance of four or five hundred miles?

This border patrol was established by a former official of this Government. They keep a few troops at a point here and then a few miles over the mountain at another point, all along that border, to prevent these bandits and thieves from Mexico coming across and destroying the property and the lives of American citizens. Now, I want to state to my good friend from Mississippi and the members of this committee that the establishing of a patrol of a few soldiers scattered all along will prevent these marauding bands of Mexico, in that rough fastness, from crossing over to this side and depredating upon my people and Americans all along the border from Brownsville to California. I want to state to my friend that in that big scope of country—and while it is not the most fertile and valuable part of our country it is American territory—why my friends there are places there so rough along the Rio Grande where a billygoat could not climb the mountains unless he went up in an airship and came down with a parachute. I want to tell my friend that four years ago last Christmas a bunch of Mexicans, I think about 300, came across the Rio Grande there, mounted, one a Carranza lieutenant in the uniform of the Mexican Army, and raided the ranch of Mr. L. C. Bright, a prominent ranchman, on Christmas Day, and killed one of his men right in the yard. His men barricaded themselves in the ranch houses and stood off the bandits until American troops could get there from Marfa, Tex., and ran them across the Rio Grande. The American troops killed a portion of them and recovered some of the loot they had taken from the ranch.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Killed most of them?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes. That is what they should have done, and they got the Carranza lieutenant in the full uniform of Carranza's army. And I want to state to my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is on the committee, I do not know whether he agreed with General Harbord, and I want to state here that I am not quarreling with this splendid Army official but simply taking issue with him on this matter, about the removing of this border patrol, but I want to state to him that when it is removed the local officers of my State will not be able to cope with the situation, I fear. We have not as many of the Texas rangers there, unfortunately, as we have had.

Take off the border patrol and you are going to leave about 800 miles of territory in my district virtually unprotected, as I see it and the citizens living along the river largely see it. General Harbord, as I stated in the beginning, is a very efficient officer, but I think he is mistaken when he advocates their removal. What is the use of having troops at San Antonio, Fort Sam Houston, or even at Fort Clark, when a bunch of bandits can come across at Langtry, or south of Sanderson, and steal a herd of cattle and kill a number of Americans and get safely back across the river before the troops would be able to reach the scene? What could troops do at San Antonio toward stopping the raid at Eagle Pass or Del Rio?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman stated that General Harbord made a personal investigation of border conditions?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes, sir; I know that he has made a full investigation all along the border in Texas just recently.

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the inquiry directed by the gentleman from Texas, I have every confidence in the general's ability as to what is needed and necessary for the military activities of the Government, and I accept the decision of the military authorities in everything pertaining to tactics.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Well, I do not. I claim to be somewhat familiar with the conditions in that section, having been born and raised there, and I do not think the citizenship out there would agree with my friend from Wisconsin or General Harbord that this border patrol should be removed.

Now, with all due respect to my friend, General Harbord, he has made the inspection and states that he has abandoned some posts down in another district there; but I want to state to you gentlemen here—and I think the citizenship along the border would agree with this, that it is very dangerous at this time to remove the border patrol and concentrate the troops at interior points. When you do that you leave the citizenship at the mercy of every bandit on the other side who may desire to come across and get some free cattle and free horses, and probably take an additional toll in the lives of good Americans. We have not yet recognized Mexico. I do not know when we will do so. And while conditions, I will state, are better along the border now than they were a year ago, or two years ago, it is not absolutely quiet there yet. And I want to state to you gentlemen on the majority side that I believe in protecting every foot of American soil.

I believe in protecting the life of every American, and I do not think we ought to have to resort to methods pursued probably 40 years ago, at any rate, when the bandits and Indians used to come across and depredate our Americans and when a certain American force under a certain American general chased them into Mexico about 100 miles and rounded them up and killed every one of them. I do not think we ought to go back to a thing of that kind. This statement is not made in a spirit of hostility toward anyone, but I make it in justice to the people I represent and the protection of their property. General Harbord, I will state, recently stated to me that he had no intention of abandoning certain posts along the border; but I would very much regret to see the border patrol taken off, and it is of so grave importance I felt I should call it to the attention of the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the gentleman that it was not the intention of the subcommittee in any way to weaken the defense of the Mexican border. I believe it is the duty of the Federal Government to protect that border. I do not believe it is even one of the duties of the State, unless the State wants to voluntarily assume the duty, to guard that border. It is purely the business of the National Government. But the 3,600 miles of border which my friend speaks of is an enormous territory to patrol if the members are to touch elbows. By that I mean, to go from one point to another. The Army assure us they do not want, or is it necessary, to have that guard on the border now, when the patrol is divided up into small squads, the Army officers seeming to think that that is the most dangerous sort of patrol, because if you have small squads of 40 or 50 men scattered along at different places on the 3,600 miles you can not have an effective force. So the military experts, who alone ought to know best about this particular matter, contend that with these posts that are back from the border a reasonable distance, with proper observation they can more successfully defend the border against an invasion than they could if you had a guard made up of these small units. Now, whether that is true or not, I do not know, and I do not pretend to know.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There was, however, a difference of opinion relative to that by another official of this Government, at another time, was there not?

Mr. SISSON. I think there was a division of sentiment about it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Now, I want to ask my friend a question. Does it not stand to reason that a body of troops stationed 100 or 150 miles from a post base can not properly protect that border when you can only get there on horseback, or put down a raid or protect the lives of the people living along that border if a party of Mexicans came across in order to make a raid?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that it is the intention of the War Department to keep a force that far from the border.

Mr. HUDSPETH. But Fort Sam Houston is 150 miles from the border.

Mr. SISSON. I do not know about the distance of the post from the border. But the idea is you can guard a broader scope of territory if you have at the center of your arc, if you will permit that description, a sufficient force to enable them to get at the point of invasion quickly. I do not believe it is the intention of this Congress, or the intention of the War Department, or the intention of anybody, to guard that 3,600 miles as if we were actually at war, because I do not believe that half a million men could sufficiently guard the border so that a man could not possibly cross the border at all.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not quite understand what my friend from Texas is specifically proposing. Does this bill give latitude to the War Department to protect the border sufficiently?

Mr. SISSON. I think so. Now, along the border they have small squads of men stationed in little posts, or whatever you want to call them. They are very unsatisfactory places for the men to stop in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAPES). The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Now, these men were scattered along in small squads. The War Department's idea, as I understand it, is to keep back 40 or 50 miles from the border with larger forces of men so as to have a sufficient force together to move to any point of invasion and thereby, as they say, strengthen these guards on the border.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. What I would like to know is this: Does this bill force any definite policy upon the War Department in guarding the border?

Mr. SISSON. Not at all.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I call attention to General Harbord's testimony.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Congress has no power to force troops along the Rio Grande unless we pass a special law that they should be located on that border. You make an appropriation for so many troops, but it is in the discretion of the War Department whether they shall distribute them along the Rio Grande or put them in St. Louis or elsewhere.

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely.

Mr. GARNER. Congress is helpless, so far as locating the troops is concerned, at any place along the border.

Mr. SISSON. I agree with the gentleman that under the present law he is right about it.

Mr. GARNER. Congress could pass a bill, as I understand it, that would compel the maintenance of a certain number of troops along the Rio Grande, but there is no such statute.

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And as a result it is wholly within the discretion of the War Department as to where they will locate these troops.

Mr. SISSON. That is correct. We have no right to pass such legislation upon this bill. When the officials of the War Department come before us and ask for a certain amount of money necessary to patrol the border we give it to them, but we, of course, leave the question of how to dispose of the troops to the officers in charge.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. The controversy prevailing seems to be between my friend from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH] and the views of the War Department. I wonder if there is not some misunderstanding about the question of safety. Of course, it will be easily seen and understood that if the troops are massed in larger numbers and kept 50 miles from the border, both the troops and the officers would be safer. But how about the 50 miles of border? [Laughter.] I think there was a misunderstanding as to the safety for whom. [Laughter.]

Mr. SISSON. I think it is perhaps safer and they will get longer notice when they are 50 miles from the border than if they were spread along the actual border; but your committee has absolutely no power to control that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRAGO. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question. Has the attention of the subcommittee been called to the fact that by a War Department order what was formerly known as Camp Benning, Ga., is now officially known as "Fort" Benning, Ga.?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have no official knowledge of that fact. The same language is contained in the Budget.

Mr. CRAGO. I know; but ought not some consideration be given to that before the bill is finally enacted into law in order to forestall some decision by a comptroller in holding up this entire appropriation?

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee has no official knowledge of a change of name.

Mr. CRAGO. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is a War Department order officially designating this school as "Fort Benning," and in the bill the post is designated as "Camp Benning."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should remember that there is nothing fixed or settled by the War Department.

Mr. CRAGO. What I want to avoid is the danger of some technical comptroller holding up this appropriation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think "Camp Benning" would indicate the location of the appropriation all right.

Mr. CRAGO. I would not like to risk it. All that I ask is that the chairman give some consideration to the matter before it is too late.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman desires, we will have the clerk of the committee ask the War Department what it desires in that connection.

Mr. CRAGO. I will appreciate it if the gentleman will do that.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, speaking of the question of the patrol of the border, in the last 20 years that question of the patrol of the border has been very interesting to my people. There are nine posts in the district that I have the honor to represent in Texas. At one time, when Mr. Taft was Secretary of War, there were only two companies of troops along that stretch of 1,200 miles from El Paso to the mouth of the Rio Grande River, at Fort McIntosh. That was done on the ground that there was local objection to the presence of colored troops, and that if they did not want colored troops down there they could not have any troops at all, and they moved them away.

The fact is Congress has nothing to do with the control of those troops unless it undertakes the direction of maintaining certain classes of troops at certain posts, and Congress up to date has not assumed that responsibility.

Now, we need more troops along that border, in my opinion, and they ought to be Cavalry troops, and I think if the administration would exercise a little discretion and get out from under the influence of certain gentlemen they could move some of the troops from Wyoming—Cavalry troops—and distribute them along the border. That would be in accordance with the best judgment of the country. [Applause.]

I know whereof I speak, because I have been told by the best-informed men in the Cavalry branch of the Army that those troops at a certain post in Wyoming—a Cavalry regiment—has no business being there. They ought to be somewhere else. But you know, and the country knows, why they have remained there. They are influential men who have brought it about, men who are particularly influential in another body as well as this, and it is their influence, in my judgment, that causes those troops to remain at that post when they ought to be distributed along the Rio Grande or at some other point.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman think it would be more advantageous to the Government to use the splendid big barrack buildings that are in this Wyoming post than go to the expense of maintaining the troops at these expensive border camps?

Mr. GARNER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what is the matter now.

Mr. ANTHONY. We already have the necessary barracks and quarters there.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, the purpose of maintaining an army is not simply that they should occupy the quarters which exist at some particular place.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman know the Big Bend country?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been one part of the border that has been most heavily patrolled in the last six years. It is only 150 or 200 miles across it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It is not 300 miles.

Mr. ANTHONY. They have had from 12 to 15 posts there, and it was costing the Government more than a million dollars a month more to maintain those 12 or 15 posts than if those troops were concentrated in one post. General Harbord says he has cut out those scattered posts and is going to concentrate the troops along the border.

Mr. GARNER. So far as the invasion for war purposes of Texas is concerned from an enemy across the border, I admit that. We now have sufficient troops in striking distance to prevent it. However, if you are going to undertake to protect the border from every raid of two or three bandits who steal our cattle and kill our citizens, you are not doing it in the way it should be done. I think the War Department takes the position that so far as petty theft is concerned by two or three people coming across to steal horses or cattle, and, if necessary, to kill a Texan in order to accomplish the result, they are not going to be responsible for that kind of invasion; and I admit that if you consider such an invasion not a matter for the War Department to consider, then the War Department is looking at the matter in the proper way.

I think there is another reason why these troops are not kept along the border. The Army is human, the same as you and I, and Army officers and men would rather stay at Fort Sam Houston, San Antonio, than to stay at Fort Ringgold, many miles from the railroad. There is no doubt about that. If you give a young officer an assignment to one of those places, he is as mad as he can be and he will do everything he can to get away from it. I do not blame them, but I say if the War Department is undertaking to take care of that border, to protect the lives and property of the citizens of Texas, it ought to pursue a different method from the present one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. The district which I represent extends between 400 and 500 miles along the border. I have no complaint to make as to the troops along the border in that district, and I want to say to my colleague [Mr. HUDSPETH] that I had a letter from General Harbord yesterday in which he assured me that there was no intention to remove the troops in the district that I represent. I was very much gratified by that, because I had had a number of letters and petitions asking me to intervene and to suggest the retention of the troops at the posts which they are now occupying. As I say, General Harbord assured me that those troops would probably remain at their various posts where they are now situated, and especially at the one I referred to, Fort Ringgold, which is the most outlying post probably in my district.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Does the State of Texas still maintain a force of rangers to protect the citizens along the border?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; we have four companies of rangers.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Fifty men.

Mr. GARNER. We have 50 rangers, or four companies, but they are not used so much along the border as they are in the interior of Texas. Wherever there is a condition existing where the sheriff is not entirely sure that he can maintain order he requests the adjutant general to send him two or three rangers, and they are sent into that territory.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. What condition arises, or might arise, in the interior to call for the presence of these rangers?

Mr. GARNER. The same as in most States, I presume. Sometimes in the trial of criminal cases there will be factions, and sometimes the sheriff might not be doing his full duty, and the district judge might conclude that it was better and safer to have an impartial officer there.

Mr. DENISON. Does the State of Texas have a National Guard?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; we have a pretty well organized National Guard. I wanted to make this statement merely in order that the House may understand, and in order that the committee may understand, that Congress has absolutely nothing to do with the location of the troops in this country unless it undertakes to determine the matter by legislative enactment, which it has never done. All we can do regarding that border is to place the matter before the War Department in the best way we can, trusting to them to take care of the people of Texas, and they have said repeatedly and I believe that it is their purpose to see that the people of Texas and their property are thoroughly taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, on page 39, line 23, I move to strike out the word "Camp" and insert the word "Fort."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WRIGHT: On page 39, line 23, strike out the word "Camp" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Fort."

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to tell the gentleman that at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] the clerk of the committee just called up the War Department to ask its wishes in regard to the amendment the gentleman offers, and the reply came back that they would prefer to allow the present language to remain.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MILITARY POSTS, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

For a refrigerating plant at Schofield Barracks, Hawaiian Islands, including the necessary structures and equipment requisite for completing and placing the same in readiness for operation, $150,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: On page 40, after line 9, add the following paragraph:

"The appropriation of $600,000 made in the deficiency appropriation act for fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, which was approved June 16, 1921, for the installment of a pipe line to replace the present water main from Koolau Reservoir to Schofield Barracks, fiscal year 1922, is reappropriated and made available for fiscal year 1923: Provided, That the funds so appropriated may be expended for any modified or alternative supply system which the Secretary of War on further investigation may determine to be more economical and satisfactory."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just offered has come to the committee from the Bureau of the Budget in the form of a supplemental estimate within the last few days, after the bill had been printed and placed before the House. Briefly the situation is that a year ago we appropriated $600,000 to improve the water supply for Schofield Barracks, Hawaii. It seems that several years ago the water main which conducts the supply from its source to the barracks was laid with steel pipe, and that in the few intervening years the steel pipe rusted and gave way until there was grave danger of the water supply failing at any time. The mistake was that the pipe was steel instead of wrought iron, the latter being the material universally used. Now the War Department says that instead of replacing this pipe line it would like to have the authority to make other needed changes in the water-supply system. The water supply at the Schofield Barracks is growing less and the number of men there increasing each year, and they desire to make improvements to get water from additional sources. They want an appropriation not only to relay the pipes but to improve the water service, and the committee thought it would be proper to give them this sum.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. What is the acreage of Schofield Barracks?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not the exact figures, but if I recollect aright the reservation there comprises several thousand acres of ground.

Mr. WATSON. How many soldiers are stationed there?

Mr. ANTHONY. In the island of Oahu all told there are 11,000.

Mr. WATSON. Are there any native soldiers?

Mr. ANTHONY. Some Hawaiians are in the National Guard. They have several efficient units of the National Guard well organized. I think it numbers approximately 1,500 or 2,000.

Mr. WATSON. This $150,000 for a refrigerating plant—is that to build a new one?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a new proposition. Schofield Barracks is located 12 or 15 miles from Honolulu, and they get their supply of ice for a large garrison of about 6,000 men by rail and by motor truck. A considerable portion of the ice is lost in that hot climate during the transit. Then they claim that they have no proper refrigeration for food supplies, being dependent on Honolulu cold storage, and so we thought we would give them the appropriation referred to.

Mr. WATSON. What is the total appropriation for this military post in Hawaii?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not subdivided in that way. The lump-sum appropriations for various items are divided among all the posts by the War Department.

Mr. WATSON. It must be considerable where you appropriate $600,000 in one lump.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; the committee gave it as its judgment that the cost of maintaining that part of the Army in Hawaii and in Panama is almost as much to-day as the entire cost of the Army was after the Spanish War.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ROADS, WALKS, WHARVES, AND DRAINAGE.

For the construction and repair by the Quartermaster Corps of roads, walks, and wharves; for the pay of employees; for the disposal of drainage; for dredging channels; and for care and improvement of grounds at military posts and stations, $500,000: Provided, That none of the funds appropriated or made available under this act shall be used for the permanent construction of any roads, walks, or wharves connected with any of the National Army cantonments or National Guard camps.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 14, after the word "camps," strike out the semicolon and add "for the building and improvement of roads through Fort Riley (Kans.) Reservation to connect with the State highways reaching said reservation from the north, south, east, and west, $191,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to build Government roads through the Fort Riley (Kans.) Reservation which will connect up with State roads already built by the county and surrounding territory to the reservation. The Fort Riley Reservation consists of about 20,000 acres in the midst of a very rich agricultural section. Along the southern portion is a main highway, called the Golden Belt Highway, that runs east and west through the State of Kansas and traverses this entire reservation. The reservation cuts off much agricultural territory to the north and east from its market at Junction City. The Government by its highway appropriations has encouraged the building of highways in the territory surrounding Fort Riley, and they have built good roads up to the reservation. Last year a brick road from Junction City was built to the west side of the reservation. Roads from the north have been completed down to the reservation and from the south and east. The roads through the reservation, however, are practically worthless for transportation facilities. During the war the War Department built a road from Fort Riley to Camp Funston, but the heavy traffic destroyed the surface and now it is in such a condition that it will be entirely destroyed if it is not resurfaced. There is no road running south and north on the reservation.

I want to read a letter sent and signed by the different civic bodies at Junction City, Kans.:

SEPTEMBER 17, 1921.

HON. JAMES G. STRONG,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STRONG: The undersigned organizations and officials wish to outline further the matter of improving the roads across the Fort Riley Military Reservation, which was discussed informally with you when you were here.

In the last few years this country has spent a large amount of money and has done a great deal of work toward improving its road system. Within the last year alone it has finished about 8 miles of hard-surfaced road. Its dirt roads are kept well graded and dragged, and it has been planned to hard-surface a new road each year.

The Fort Riley Military Reservation lies in the midst of a rich agricultural section, and on one side adjoins the city of Junction City. The trade territory of Junction City completely surrounds the reservation. Three heavily traveled cross-country highways traverse the reservation, as do several other roads of more local use. The roads on the reservation, except a few which are of military importance, are in miserable condition and in great contrast to those in the country surrounding.

The road marked "No. 3" on the accompanying map connects Junction City with the towns of Army City, Ogden, and Manhattan, and forms a connecting link in the great Golden Belt and Union Pacific Highways, both of which extend from Denver to Kansas City. The part of these highways off of the reservation is colored yellow on the map. During the past summer this section of road has been traveled by hundreds of tourists daily, besides an immense local traffic between the points mentioned above and Fort Riley and Camp Funston. The part of this highway from the west end of Geary County to the edge of the military reservation is paved with concrete or brick. From the Republican River bridge, at the entrance to the reservation, up to the hospital in Fort Riley it is paved with asphalt, and is in good condition. From the hospital northeast to the reservation line, a distance of over 4 miles, the road was paved with penetration macadam during the war. Since that time it has had no care, and is now full of holes. It can not be traveled with comfort at any speed, nor at a greater speed than 15 miles per hour without danger to springs and axles. It becomes worse daily. It needs immediate repair and constant maintenance work.

The road marked No. 2 on the map is part of the north and south highway from Canada to the Gulf. It more immediately connects Junction City and points south with Riley, Keats, and points north. It is used by a large farming community north of the reservation to reach Junction City, which is the natural trading point of the community. The part of the north and south highway not on the reservation is colored brown on the map. The part of this road in Geary County is about equally divided between an extremely well-kept natural road and a concrete or brick pavement. After entering the reservation across the Republican River bridge at the north boundary of Junction City, about 500 yards of the road is a very wretched macadam, on which nothing has been done for the last several years. For about 1½ miles farther on the road is bituminous macadam and is now in good condition. In the near future, however, it will need maintenance work to keep it so. The bituminous macadam road turns east around a bend in the Republican River toward Fort Riley. At this turn the north and south highway branches and after winding up a canyon through the bluffs goes in a northerly direction to the north end of the reservation. This part of the road is in extremely poor condition. No attempt has ever been made to pave it, and it has been many years since it has been graded. No action is taken on the part of anyone to drag it or keep it in good condition. No culverts are provided. It is crossed by many small ravines or draws which in rainy weather wash rills and valleys without molestation. The road through the canyon is narrow and dangerous, and at a great many periods of the year it is impassable for any traffic and is generally in such condition that heavy loads can not be hauled over it. On the uplands the road is a shifting one. Whenever it becomes so badly worn in one place that traffic is impossible, travelers take to the side of the road and a new track is worn. There are about 4 miles of road in this condition.

The road marked No. 1 on the map is a link in a county road connecting the small town of Milford and the surrounding country with Junction City. The part of the road in Geary County is a well-kept natural road. The part on the reservation is partly dirt and partly macadam, but the macadam was put down about 15 years ago and has had no attention paid to it since. The road would be better if nothing had ever been done to it. Traffic generally abandons the macadam and takes to the side of the road. All of this road on the reservation is extremely sandy and is full of large and small holes. A very large local traffic uses this road. Heavy loads can not be hauled across it by one team, except at the cost of very great exertion. The part on the reservation is 3 miles long.

The road marked No. 4 on the map connects Fort Riley with a county road leading to the eastern part of Geary County and traveled by the people living in about one-third of the whole county, only the west half of which is shown on the map. The part of the road from Fort Riley to the Kansas River bridge has recently been resurfaced with asphalt and is in excellent condition. The part east of the river is a mere track and can be used only in dry weather. In wet weather water stands from a few inches to a foot deep on a considerable part of it. The road is not generally now traveled by people from the east part of the county, except in dry weather, because there is a well-kept road going around the edge of the reservation. These people would prefer road No. 4 if it were kept in condition because it more immediately connects with the paved road from Fort Riley to Junction City. The part needing attention is only 1 mile long.

The main traveled county roads connecting with reservation roads are colored purple on the map. The roads herein mentioned as being on the reservation are all colored red.

Attempts have frequently been made in the past to have these roads improved. Commandant after commandant has recommended improvement to the War Department. The War Department investigates, not as to its necessity to the surrounding community but as to whether or not the improvement is a military necessity. Of course it is not. On finding that it is not a military necessity, but only for the general convenience of the civilian population surrounding the reservation, the War Department refuses to spend the money. They claim, and perhaps rightly, that their appropriations are only to be expended for work actually necessary from a military point of view. On the other hand, we see Congress appropriating millions and millions of dollars to aid the States in building and maintaining hard-surfaced roads. Our own county has availed itself of many thousands of dollars of these appropriations. In spite of this, the coordination of effort in the Federal Government is so loose that the roads on the Government's own property are worse than existed in the surrounding community 50 years ago. While encouraging the State to improve its roads it sets the example of doing nothing to improve its own.

The authorities of the State and county have absolutely no control over the reservation roads. Exclusive jurisdiction of the reservation was ceded to the Federal Government in 1889. Both the State and Federal Supreme Courts have held that this placed all legislative power in Congress. Even the money which the county spends on the upkeep of road No. 5 is expended illegally, and any taxpayer could prevent the work being done.

We earnestly urge that this matter is one which should not be left to the War Department to pass upon only as to its own needs, but that there is a duty which the Federal Government owes its citizens who live around the reservation to keep the arteries of communication in at least as good condition as those in the country surrounding. Better even than this would be for the Federal Government to set an example in the building and upkeep of roads. If this can be done through interdepartmental action, well and good. If an act of Congress is necessary, we urge you to introduce and push it.

Yours truly,

The proposition was taken up with the War Department in an effort to get them to procure an appropriation. An officer visiting Fort Riley two months ago made an inspection of the condition of the roads and recommended that the roads should be built, but suggested that the State should build the road. Under our constitution money can not be appropriated by the State for internal improvements. This condition was taken up by me with the War Department and I will read a letter from the Secretary of War explaining his position:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 16, 1922.

Hon. JAMES G. STRONG,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. STRONG: With reference to your conversation on the 15th instant with General Harbord, I find that there are no funds available at the disposition of the War Department for improvement of the roads through the Fort Riley Reservation, which are desired by the citizens in that neighborhood.

As I understand the matter, your improvement of roads in Kansas by the State is limited by your State constitution to the expenditure of funds on public roads which are raised by assessment or taxation on real estate to which the road is adjacent or near where the road is expected to run, constituting a benefit district, and that even with this State limitation to affect it when the road law shall ultimately be passed, as yet your legislature has failed to pass its road law.

Under these circumstances, if the case has been correctly stated to me, I see no reason why the National Government should not undertake to pay for such necessary roads through the reservation as connect up with important highways reaching the reservation from either side and the passage of which through the military reservation would not prejudice its military activities. I can not undertake to meet such expense, however, from any funds now at my disposition or that are included in the Budget for 1923, nor could I consent to any such an item for 1923 to the exclusion of any other item now appearing in those estimates.

If, under these circumstances, you desire to seek a separate appropriation for the construction of roads through the Fort Riley Reservation, designated as follows, the department will interpose no objection: The Golden Belt Highway, and the Beatrice, Nebr., Junction City line running north and south through the reservation.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

The civic bodies at Junction City, Kans., had the county engineers prepare an estimate of what these roads would cost, and I have a letter of February 18, 1922, addressed to me by Attorney Arthur S. Humphrey, inclosing such estimate, which I will read:

HUMPHREY & HUMPHREY,
Junction City, Kans., February 18, 1922.

Hon. JAMES G. STRONG,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STRONG: The county engineer has prepared an estimate of the cost of the reservation roads, which I inclose. He has figured this for 18-foot roads of bituminous macadam. This, of course, is much less expensive than concrete or brick.

Yours truly, ARTHUR S. HUMPHREY.

Bituminous macadam roads on Fort Riley Reservation, 18-foot roads.

No. 1, 3¼ miles, at $16,000 per mile	$52,000
No. 2, 4 miles, at $18,000 per mile	72,000
No. 3, 4¼ miles, at $12,000 per mile	51,000
No. 4, 1 mile, at $16,000 per mile	16,000
Total	191,000

It seems to me that if the Federal Government has a reservation in the heart of an agricultural community, which has been encouraged by the Government to build roads up to the line of the reservation, that the Government should build the roads through its own territory to permit the people to pass through the reservation. I hope this amendment will be allowed to come to a vote and that it will receive favorable consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I can not meet the expectation or the wishes of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG]. I make the point of order that this is not authorized by existing law and is not germane. As I understand the proposal, it is for the construction of public roads through a military reservation—not only one public road, but three or four public roads. The gentleman from Kansas admitted that in his statement in justification of the appropriation. There is no authority in law anywhere for the construction of a public road or any road through this reservation. It is on a par with the case which has arisen many times in connection with the Indian appropriation bill, where it required special legislative enactment to authorize the construction of a highway through an Indian reservation. If this were in order, it would be in order for me to offer an amendment to provide for highway construction through the branch home at Milwaukee; it would be in order to authorize highway construction through the branch home at Dayton, or any of the reservations or posts throughout the country.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that this Congress can not appropriate money to build a road through a military reservation?

Mr. STAFFORD. It can not authorize money to build a public highway.

Mr. LITTLE. Can it construct a road through a military reservation?

Mr. STAFFORD. This is for the construction of a public highway, as admitted by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. But I am going to rename it; I am going to call it a military road. Can we build one through a reservation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; you can build a road through a military reservation for military purposes, but not for highway purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. What is going to be the difference? I am asking for information. The gentleman is familiar with the laws governing this. What is the difference between one road and another? They will be exactly alike, will they not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. For instance, through an Indian reservation for the uses of the Indians themselves one character of road might be sufficient. For the purposes of a military reservation one character of road might be sufficient. Here it is proposed to build three or four roads, not for the restricted benefit of the reservation, but for the benefit of the outside public. Futhermore, it is not germane. This appropriation provides for the construction and repair under the control of the quartermaster of these roads. That leaves it in his discretion to dispense the money appropriated for the construction of roads.

This amendment invades that discretion which he now has by directing him to build a road which had not been heretofore authorized. If this amendment is in order, an amendment would be in order for the construction of buildings, to erect a building on any of these reservations for the benefit of the public, even though it may have incidental benefit to the members of the post. There is no direct authorization for the construction. It invades the discretion now vested in the department in the construction of roads, and because it invades that discretion it is violative of the rules. It is legislation and should not be carried on an appropriation bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not true that, so far as the War Department is concerned, it has no jurisdiction over the construction of roads, except within military reservations, and then only for military purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois, who has had long experience on the Committee on Military Affairs, points out the limitation of the War Department in respect to the construction of roads, that they must be within miliary reservations and for military purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in his interpretation of the law, you could not ever build any road across a military reservation. Any road that you build across one would surely be a public road for individuals to travel across, and anybody could drive across there. Every single, solitary road that is built across a military reservation would be impossible, if his argument is sound, because it would be "a public road." It is true that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] spoke of it as a public road for public benefit. I am quite familiar with this reservation. Every road that has been there has always been used by the public. It is true that they are not very good, but it is also true that they ought to be. There is no reason in the world why this Congress should not arrange for a reasonable appropriation to make decent roads in that reservation. Its roads are discreditable to the Government. It will be just as much accommodation to the military people as to anyone else. There is nothing in this argument, because, if the gentleman is correct, all one has to do is to have some Congressman get up and in a debate say that it will be a public road, traveled by the public, and the gentleman from Wisconsin will then rule it out. This is a sensible, reasonable proposition of Mr. STRONG's. As far as the expression "public road" is concerned, that certainly can not have any weight with reasonable men. It is just an expression. All he charges is that the gentleman from Kansas happened to speak of it as such. I can watch these debates and all that is necessary is that I should get up and say that this is going to be a public road, and out it would go, if the gentleman from Wisconsin is right.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This paragraph to which the amendment is offered is for the construction and repair of roads under the Quartermaster Corps. Does the Quartermaster Corps control this road in this particular reservation?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. It will be used more by the Army than anyone else in the world.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then it is germane to this particular paragraph.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is within the province of the gentleman from Kansas, the mover of the amendment, to offer an amendment to increase the amount so as to leave it within the discretion of the quartermaster in the disbursement of that fund, but he can not specially authorize the construction of a road which has not been heretofore authorized by legislation.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. But there is no specific authority for any of these roads. The gentleman admits the Congress has the power to build roads in this reservation.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the difference between one road and another? A little difference in width or material. That will be left to the quartermaster. He is not going to tell us that we can not make this appropriation because it is called a public road. It is absurd. This military road will be used by the public who drive through the reservation. So will every military road everywhere. But this does not prevent the existence of miles and miles of them and should not prevent this.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I referred to these roads as public roads because the public uses them, but they are necessary to the use of the reservation and are a military necessity. The Fort Riley Reservation would be in a very peculiar predicament if the public had not built roads to it. Of course the fort would not be of much value if they had not roads to the reservation and within it, and one of those roads crossing the reservation from west to east, running from Fort Riley to Camp Funston, is a military road built of macadam during the war. I said very plainly in my remarks on the amendment that the surface of this road had been destroyed, and unless repaired the foundation of the road would be entirely destroyed. It is for the repair of this and other roads on the reservation that the appropriation is asked. The War Department itself will say that in the operation and conduct of its fort that these roads are a necessity. Now, as to the matter of its being germane, you will notice under this section, entitled "Roads, walks, wharves, and drainage," there is a provision placed in it by the committee which reads as follows:

Provided, That none of the funds appropriated or made available under this act shall be used for the permanent construction of any road, walk, or wharves connected with any of the National Army cantonments or National Guard camps.

If the committee did not think they had given the right under this section to construct roads and walks to the different camps, why did they put in the proviso? It seems to me the very fact they did put in the proviso shows that under this section the building of roads was authorized. Therefore this amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. In the opinion of the Chair this amendment must be justified, if it is to be justified at all, as an appropriation for the continuing of an existing public work already in progress. The Chair hardly thinks that the proposition of building a new road across a military reservation to connect with outside highways to approach, as the amendment says, from the north, south, east, and west, would be construed to be a continuation of a public work already in progress. The Chair feels compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer another amendment in regard to the appropriation; in line 10, add to the sum of $500,000 the sum of $191,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Page 42, line 10, strike out "$500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$691,000."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of War, having given his approval to the building of these roads in the letter I have placed in the RECORD, practically says they are necessary, and having explained to the committee that this reservation is in the heart of a rich agricultural section in which the people have built roads at enormous expense up to the reservation on the north, south, east, and west—it does seem to me that this Government ought to build roads through this reservation both for its own use and for the use of people who have built roads up to it. I hope that this amendment may prevail. The Secretary of War will build the roads if he can get the money for the purpose, because he knows it is just to do so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, just a word. If we would launch into the policy suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], of building highways as may be needed to connect with highways outside of reservations, it would require much more than the $191,000 proposed in the amendment, or $691,000 in all, but would run into the millions of dollars. It has not been and should not be the policy of the Government at this time, when the committee is doing everything in its power to conserve the revenues of the Government, to authorize or even to increase the amount of appropriations beyond that which is necessary. Six hundred and ninety thousand dollars is a very large amount to be appropriated for this purpose. It is not necessary. If we would improve public highways in all the reservations carried in this bill on the scale proposed by the gentleman's amendment, it would run up to three or four or possibly ten or twenty million dollars. We are not attempting to single out any one project for special consideration, and I do not think the committee wishes to introduce that policy.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have just one word to say. I do not know whether, as a military proposition, this is needed or not. There is no disposition to prevent the increase of the appropriation if it is needed for military purposes, but there has been no hearing, no estimate for this amount; the War Department evidently saw no pressing necessity for it. Your committee has not had an opportunity for any hearing, no record of any kind except an ex parte statement about it, and I think it would be a very unfortunate precedent to set, and would be a very bad method of appropriating $191,000, without some evidence or some record to support it other than the statement of a Member on the floor.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I put in the RECORD the letter of the Secretary of War showing he had made an investigation of it and that these roads ought to be built.

Mr. SISSON. I do not want an ex parte statement about the matter; I would rather have a hearing on it. Now, if you are going to appropriate money in this way, every gentleman who goes and gets a letter from a Cabinet officer stating that a certain amount of money is needed and brings that letter here—then if we deal with all of them alike, and as the gentleman wants to be dealt with here, then every one of us would be entitled to an appropriation if we can get one Cabinet officer to say that we need it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Is not this the forum where you present your case if you have a just one?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely; but it is a case that must be presented so that every man can vote upon it intelligently.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sum of $50,000 of the appropriation available for the fiscal year 1923 for the "Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees," may be expended for personal services in the Cemeterial Division, office of the Quartermaster General, for compiling, recording, preparing, and transmitting data incident to bringing home and disposition of remains from abroad: Provided, That no person shall be employed under this allotment at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum except one person at $2,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. Do the employees that are listed at the top of the page get commutation of quarters?

Mr. ANTHONY. The civilian employees do not.

The Clerk read as follows:

AIR SERVICE, ARMY.

For creating, maintaining, and operating at established flying schools and balloon schools courses of instruction for officers, students, and enlisted men, including cost of equipment and supplies necessary for instruction, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, machines, textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, instruments, and materials for theoretical and practical instruction; for maintenance, repair, storage, and operation of airships, war balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments, materials, gas plants, hangars, and repair shops, and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; for purchase of supplies for securing, developing, printing, and reproducing photographs in connection with aerial photography; improvement, equipment, maintenance, and operation of plants for testing and experimental work, and procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, gas and sewerage, including maintenance, operation, and repair of such utilities at such plants; for the acquisition of land or interest in land by purchase, lease, or condemnation where necessary to explore for, procure, or reserve helium gas, and also for the purchase, manufacture, construction, maintenance, and operation of plants for the production thereof and experimentation therewith; salaries and wages of civilian employees as may be necessary, and payment of their traveling and other necessary expenses as authorized by existing law; transportation of materials in connection with consolidation of Air Service activities; experimental investigation and purchase and development of new types of aircraft, accessories thereto, and aviation engines, including patents and other rights thereto, and plans, drawings, and specifications thereof; for the purchase, manufacture, and construction of airships, balloons, and other aerial machines, including instruments, gas plants, hangars, and repair shops, and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; for the purchase, manufacture, and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes; for all necessary expenses connected with the sale or disposal of surplus or obsolete aeronautical equipment, and the rental of buildings and other facilities for the handling or storage of such equipment; for the services of such consulting engineers at experimental stations of the Air Service as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, including necessary traveling expenses; purchase of special apparatus and appliances, repairs, and replacements of same used in connection with special scientific medical research in the Air Service; for printing and binding, including supplies, equipment, and repairs for such Air Service printing plants outside of the District of Columbia as may be authorized in accordance with law; for publications, station libraries, special furniture, supplies and equipment for offices, shops, and laboratories; for special services, including the salvaging of wrecked aircraft, $12,431,000: Provided, That not to exceed $2,750,000 from this appropriation may be expended for pay and expenses of civilian employees other than those employed in experimental and research work; not exceeding $400,000 may be expended for experimentation, conservation, and production of helium; not exceeding $3,250,000 may be expended for experimental and research work with airplanes or lighter-than-air craft and their equipment, including the pay of necessary civilian employees; not exceeding $450,000 may be expended for the production of lighter-than-air equipment; and not exceeding $324,000 may be expended for improvement of stations, hangars, and gas plants for the Regular Army: Provided further, That not less than $2,053,000 shall be expended for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts, and accessories: Provided further, That claims not exceeding $250 in amount for damages to persons and private property resulting from the operation of aircraft at home and abroad may be settled out of the funds appropriated hereunder when each claim is substantiated by a survey report of a board of officers appointed by the commanding officer of the nearest aviation post and approved by the Chief of Air Service and the Secretary of War: Provided further, That claims so settled and paid from the sum hereby appropriated shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $4,000: Provided further, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on page 50, line 17, down to line 19, I move to strike out the words:

For the acquisition of land or interest in land by purchase, lease, or condemnation where necessary to explore for, procure, or reserve helium gas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 50, line 17, after the word "plants," strike out the following language:

"For the acquisition of land or interest in land by purchase, lease, or condemnation where necessary to explore for, procure, or reserve helium gas."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it may seem somewhat surprising that I make this motion, when I state that Major Thornell, who was in command of the ill-fated airship Roma, was the son of a very old and dear friend of mine, a colleague on the bench for 16 years. No one save a near relative could more regret the tragic death of Major Thornell than myself. He was a young officer of exceedingly great promise, and his death is an unquestionable loss to the Air Service.

Mr. Chairman, when the Roma went down, as usual we heard a chorus from the papers all over the country that this disaster was the fault of Congress for not having appropriated more money for helium gas. Outside of the question of whether we may with propriety continue further the experiments with helium, I want to say that we have already expended $8,000,000 trying to get helium. Whether we had enough to have filled that particular airship or not, I do not know. Probably the chairman of the committee could advise us in reference to that. But if we did not have enough to have filled that ship, we better not expend any more money on helium. If we had enough, it certainly was not the fault of Congress that the ship was destroyed. And I might say incidentally that I do not think the accident was due primarily to the kind of gas with which this great dirigible was filled. But in any event, before these appropriations go through, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that so far as I am aware all of the countries that are principally interested in aviation at this time for military purposes have discarded the giant airships. England has gone out of the production of them entirely; has refused to build any more, and sold us, or attempted to sell us, one great "white elephant" it had on its hands, which subsequently met with disaster.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to also remind the gentleman that in this morning's Washington Post is an advertisement for the sale of British airships of the R type.

Mr. GREENE of Iowa. I am obliged to my friend for the information. I had not noticed it.

I do know, however, from the repeated statements in the English papers and the elaborate discussion that has been going on that they had concluded not to build any more of them and they had concluded they were of no value in warfare. It may be said the reason they had come to that conclusion is because helium is not at present available on the Continent or in England, but I do not think this is the reason, as it can be obtained in Canada and probably in any part of Europe where there are gas wells. I only know, of course, as other Members know, that these big balloons have been filled with hydrogen gas. And I want to say in that connection that hydrogen gas has considerably more lifting power than helium. The percentage of lifting power of helium as compared with hydrogen gas is about 92 per cent. And I doubt very much if the Roma would have worked properly if filled with helium gas. But at all events the disposition to pass the responsibility of that disaster upon Congress is one that seems to affect the whole country now, and when anything goes wrong it is laid to Congress.

The Italian Government also wants to get rid of its other ships of this type. The French Government has never approved building any of these monsters. The long and the short of it is that the best aviation authorities of the world are opposed to expending any more money in this line for military purposes. The reason for this is plain. It was well demonstrated during the last war that these big balloons were readily attacked by airplanes and easily destroyed. Of course, it will be said that they were easily destroyed on account of the material with which they were filled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But the fact is that there were other reasons. The airplanes are so much speedier, they rise so much more rapidly, they work so much more handily, that they take any position they wish with reference to these big dirigible balloons, preferably one above them, where they can not be attacked by those on the dirigible and where they can let down bombs on them or play upon them with whatever artillery they carry. And all of you know that the airplanes are now built large enough to carry very formidable pieces of artillery. Of course, the balloons would be more easily destroyed when filled with hydrogen gas than when filled with helium. But I undertake to say that the conclusion of the best authorities is that they are so easily attacked and destroyed by the more active airplanes that they are of no further use and of no further military value. I hope we will not spend any more money in this direction.

I confess I have had but little expectation that my amendment would be adopted, inasmuch as I have tried similar amendments many times. While my predictions have been eventually realized, my arguments fell upon indifferent ears so far as the majority of the House is concerned. But I want to put myself on record so that I shall not be held responsible for wasting money on helium when at a future day it is finally concluded, as I am satisfied it will be, that these monster airships are useless for military or naval purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman from Iowa think it might be practicable to put up one of these large dirigibles and have it surrounded with a squadron of flying machines to protect it, and in that way get some real service out of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman believes in building a dirigible in order to build more airplanes to protect the dirigible, perhaps that might be a good theory upon which to proceed with the building of dirigibles.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the gentleman does not mean to include in his strictures the ordinary sausage balloon, intended for making observations?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was not speaking of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That, of course, is an anchorage balloon for plotting and observation purposes, and it does not involve the risk which these giant airships of other types involve. There might be more support given to the gentleman's amendment if it is understood that the purpose is not to discontinue the use of these lesser balloons.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A punctured balloon will fall whether filled with hydrogen or helium.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I had expected to remain silent with reference to this appropriation by reason of the fact that I thought that, due to the conclusive evidence which has been afforded, we had come to the deliberate judgment that it behooves us to conserve and extract this great national asset of helium gas. Regardless of whether or not there has been criticism of the Congress for its expenditures in this regard, I think surely, in the light of recent developments, Congress may be criticized if it now fails to take advantage of the opportunity which has been brought with such force to its attention.

I do not think that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] could pass a better eulogy upon his friend, or give a better tribute to his heroic service, than by trying to make it impossible for American boys living to-day to meet a similar fate. It must have been his inaccurate information with reference to the subject that prompted the gentleman's remarks. He says he does not know whether or not we have enough helium to fill an airship as large as the Roma. The Roma had a capacity of 1,200,000 cubic feet. We have in this country to-day 2,400,000 cubic feet of helium, which has been extracted from the natural gas in Texas. The gentleman says that the Roma accident primarily might have resulted even if the dirigible had been filled with helium. It might have happened primarily, for it seems to have been the fault of the steering device, or the rudders or elevators, or something of that kind. But one thing is recognized by the experts who have made an investigation of that awful catastrophe, and that is that if the Roma had been filled with helium gas instead of with hydrogen there would have been no explosion, and consequently there would not have been the great loss of life which resulted in consequence of the explosion.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If we had not bought a perfectly useless balloon, then it would not have happened.

Mr. LANHAM. Then you are talking about the structural features of the Roma and not about the gas with which it was filled?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. I am talking about that class of balloons.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman is going contrary to the conclusion of all the experts in that field of investigation, who tell us that for long-distance work there is no machine of the air that is comparable to lighter-than-air craft; and I want to say that I believe that much of this opposition to this project arises from the fact that we have in this country a practical monopoly of the helium sources of supply in all the world. The other countries, realizing the safety in the use of helium and that it absolutely obviates the likelihood of explosion, may not want us to go ahead and develop this God-given resource that we have found here in abundance in our own land. It is time for us to begin to take notice.

You say such airships are not worth while. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Captain Lucas, who brought the R-34 across the Atlantic from England and took it back, made the statement that if the Allies had had during the war two ships of that size filled with helium they could have gone over and put the German Navy out of commission any day they pleased and could have accomplished what they wished at the Dardanelles.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Germans had some ten or a dozen which were equal, if not superior, to that airship, and yet with them they did not destroy an army or sink a navy or do any considerable damage.

Mr. LANHAM. They did not have helium. But, as the gentleman will remember, they did bomb London time and time again, and inflicted considerable loss of life, despite the fact that they had to use hydrogen. And despite that fact also they were preparing to bomb New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. So they recognized the practicability and value of lighter-than-air craft, even with the use of hydrogen. In this country we have a practical monopoly of this helium gas, with 92 per cent of the lifting power of hydrogen.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman from Texas said there was enough helium in the United States to perhaps have more than filled the Roma.

Mr. LANHAM. That is true.

Mr. CROWTHER. A good deal is said in the newspapers about the responsibility for that accident to the Roma. Whose fault was it that we did not have helium in it if we had enough to supply it?

Mr. LANHAM. I am not going into the question of whose fault it was for not having helium in the Roma. I am concerned in having enough helium in this country, so that there will be no further cause for accidents of that kind with the frightful loss of life. The amount that we are spending in war-risk insurance alone to those who sacrificed their lives in the ill-fated Roma is almost equal to the amount which this bill appropriates for the acquisition of sources and the extraction and production of helium.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CROWTHER. I have read the statement, but what is the use of keeping this helium in tanks down there?

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman is advised with reference to the situation, of course he knows that this helium project is a new one and that there had not been a flight in a helium-filled dirigible until the C-7 recently made its trip from Hampton Roads to Washington and return. In that flight it was discovered that, in addition to its invulnerability from attack, in addition to the absence of explosive features, a helium-filled dirigible behaves better in the air from the standpoint of mechanical operation than one filled with hydrogen.

Mr. CROWTHER. Why should we keep the helium down there stored up in tanks? Why do we not use it?

Mr. LANHAM. It is contemplated to use it. Probably the Roma was not filled with it because they did not want to put all their eggs in one basket; but I do not undertake to say. The gentleman will have to make that inquiry of those in charge of that work.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With reference to the trip of the C-7 from Hampton Roads to Washington, were there any actual experiments to determine whether or not inflammable bullets would set off that gas? Were there any practical experiments to show its invulnerability to attacks of that sort?

Mr. LANHAM. Of course, they did not shoot into the balloon, because they had already determined in their laboratory experiments with helium that it was inert, noncombustible, and noninflammable; but when that machine landed over here in Anacostia a party of us gathered around it smoking to our hearts' content and the pilot of the ship sat in the cockpit smoking his pipe. Now, 100 yards, I understand, is the minimum distance they will allow you to approach a hydrogen-filled dirigible with fire. Yet there we sat smoking in perfect safety all about this machine. That feature of it has been demonstrated beyond any question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am in thorough sympathy with the gentleman's argument and what he is seeking to accomplish; but as a matter of curiosity I wanted to know whether there had been any actual experiments to demonstrate beyond mere theory that this helium gas is as safe as it is assumed to be.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman that there have been experiments with very small balloons, which have determined that helium is noncombustible and noninflammable.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman knows a great deal more about helium than anybody else whom I have heard talk about it here on the floor. I have been trying to find out for some time about the helium that is in Dexter, Kans. A number of years ago a company bored for gas there. They found an unusually strong well, an abundant supply of gas. All the people plumbed their houses to burn the gas for fuel. The streets were laid with gas mains, plumbers established themselves in the town, everybody got a gas stove, and then they turned on the gas, when they found that it would not burn at all, and it never has burned. As I say, the flow of gas was unusually large. I wish to ask if that is helium, or how much of it is helium?

Mr. LANHAM. Not all of the noncombustible character of that gas is due to helium, because, of course, there are a great many other noncombustible elements of gas. For instance, the gas from which we are now extracting helium contains less than 1 per cent of helium. However, that gas in Kansas has shown a very high content of helium.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. The field in Kansas is thought to be one of the chief sources of the supply of helium.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. What did it cost the Government for the 2,000,000 cubic feet of helium that we have at the present time?

Mr. LANHAM. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, and I am glad to answer it. On the 14th of this month I made some remarks in this Chamber on that subject, showing that in our three experimental plants, and in the establishment of a permanent plant, in a contract for conservation, and in the building of a pipe line after the feasibility of the project had been determined, we had expended almost $8,000,000. That was before we began the extraction of helium, except the small amount that was extracted in the experimental plants. Since we have begun the extraction of helium we have devoted to that purpose $500,000, and for that $500,000 we have obtained about 2,000,000 cubic feet of helium. From the standpoint of successful operation those figures are most gratifying, especially when we take into consideration the fact that this is an element heretofore almost unknown, and that only a few cubic feet of it had been extracted in all the world before the war began, and that at the prohibitive cost of from $1,700 to $2,000 per cubic foot.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman include in the $500,000 the plant or process by which the helium is extracted, or is that included in the millions that the gentleman mentioned just a moment ago?

Mr. LANHAM. The nearly $8,000,000 were expended to build the three original experimental plants and to build the permanent plant and to build the pipe line. Then, since we began the operation, we have appropriated for that purpose $500,000, and for the small amount that has been devoted to the extraction of helium the results have certainly been most gratifying.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand the gentleman to say that with the money expended we are now prepared to extract the helium for a comparatively small future expense.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. In reference to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], is there any doubt in the minds of naval or Army experts who have given study to this subject as to the military value of the lighter than air machine, especially when filled with helium gas?

Mr. LANHAM. There certainly is not, and I thank the gentleman for his contribution. On the other hand, they are unanimous in proclaiming the great usefulness of the lighter than air craft when this wonderful asset of helium—this inert, noncombustible, and noninflammable gas—is available.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman is correct in stating that helium gas is not inflammable.

Mr. LANHAM. That is true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Consequently it can not be set on fire by an explosive bomb. But does the gentleman doubt that the machines would be destroyed, whether they were filled with inflammable or noninflammable gas?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say that I doubt that seriously in the case of large machines. They may be constructed in compartments. The gentleman says that helium has only 92 per cent of the lifting power of hydrogen. That is more than nine-tenths, and in the little navy blimp C–7 they brought a crew of four or five from Hampton Roads up here and back. The carrying capacity of large dirigibles is between 70 and 80 tons. When you figure that in war an airship filled with noninflammable gas can carry 70 or 80 tons, go as high or as low as desired, and hover, if necessary, I do not think it is going to be subject to such terrible attacks from airplanes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Page 52, line 9, after the word "exceeding," strike out "$3,250,000" and insert "$4,200,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is no scientific subject which has been of more interest to me since the invention of the airplane than the one under present discussion. I have given to it more study and attention than to any other scientific matter in the last few years. But I shall not ask the committee to place any weight on what I say on my own authority, for with all the care that I have given and the preparations I have made I have nothing but a superficial knowledge. I have in what I am about to say been guided by the subcommittee which has prepared this bill, because they have been kind enough to inform me of the views they have taken, and I have had their help in the testimony of the witnesses which is before the House in the printed hearings.

I want to invite the committee's attention first to page 808 of the hearings, in which General Patrick states, in answer to Mr. SISSON, that "Major Bane is the most expert engineer which we have." Now, in view of that statement, I wish to read a letter which Major Bane has prepared upon the subject connected with this appropriation. It has been suggested that there has been too much experimentation on different sorts of engines. That question was not asked anywhere in the hearing. I can readily see, however, how the committee might have received that impression. So I wrote a letter to Major Bane to prepare a statement as to all the engines they were experimenting upon and whether they were necessary.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
AIR SERVICE, ENGINEERING DIVISION,
McCook Field, Dayton, Ohio, March 18, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Referring to your inquiry of March 17, I regret that the Appropriations Committee gathered the impression that the Air Service is developing too many aircraft engines. The facts are, we are limiting our development to the bare necessities of the service. Of course, different engines are required for different purposes, and the science of engine design is advancing rapidly, and we must keep abreast. We require the following types of engines for the purposes indicated:

1. Training of fliers: Reliable durable engines of 150 to 200 horsepower.

2. Light pursuit for alert work: Radial air-cooled and small V engines, water cooled, of 200 to 240 horsepower.

3. Heavy pusuit: Light, high performance, compact engines of 300 to 400 horsepower.

4. Corps observation and various other two-seated airplanes: Reliable, durable, smooth-running, economic engines of 400 to 550 horsepower.

5. Heavy bombardment and heavy ground attack: Reliable, durable, long-lived, economical engines from 600 to 1,000 horsepower; the higher the horsepower the heavier the load of bombs and armor plate that can be carried.

To fill the above requirements we have already developed the following engines for each class of work:

1. Training:

(a) The Wright 180 horsepower, model E–2, V-type, water-cooled engine.

(b) The Lawrence radial air-cooled 180 horsepower, model J–1.

2. Light pursuit: The above training engines are used with minor modifications to increase volumetric efficiency, which modifications can be made in field.

3. Heavy pursuit:

(a) The Wright 300 horsepower V-type, 8-cylinder, water-cooled, model H–3, engine.

(b) Packard, 300 horsepower, V-type, 12-cylinder, water-cooled, model 1237, engine.

4. Corps observation:

(a) Liberty, 400 horsepower, 12-cylinder, V-type, water-cooled, model 1921, engine.

(b) Packard, 550 horsepower, 12-cylinder, V-type, water-cooled, model 2025, engine.

5. Heavy bombardment: McCook Field, 700 horsepower, 18-cylinder, W-type, water-cooled engine.

In order to keep the United States abreast of the rapidly advancing science of aircraft engine design the development of the following engines has been started and must by all means be pushed to prompt completion if this country is not to lag in this field, which basically controls aircraft performance:

1. Pursuit:

(a) Curtiss, 375 horsepower, 12-cylinder, V-type, water-cooled engine; the most compact water-cooled pursuit engine of this power yet conceived.

(b) No satisfactory air-cooled high-powered engine is yet in existence, notwithstanding the extravagant claims of foreign designers. The Wright 350 horsepower, radial air-cooled, model R–1, engine is under development and shows great promise.

2. Heavy bombardment: McCook Field, 1,000 horsepower, 18-cylinder, water-cooled engine.

It should be noted that all the above engines are designed along fairly conventional lines. The Air Service, however, can not overlook the possibilities of suggestions made by commercial concerns which depart from standard practice and which appear to have promise; such a suggestion is the Almen, barrel-type, 375 horsepower pursuit engine. This engine is a distinct departure from conventional practice, being composed of a barrel-shaped engine with nine cylinders on each end horizontally placed. This engine offers possibilities in improving airplane performance due to its compactness, light weight per horsepower, small frontal area, and freedom from vibration.

There is a possibility that air-cooled engines will ultimately replace water-cooled engines for aircraft. We are therefore paralleling the development of water-cooled engines, the science of which is fairly well established, with the development of similar air-cooled engines where possible. This situation might account for the fact that the Appropriations Committee thought that we, perhaps, were developing too many types.

In addition to the above engine development we are vigorously pushing the development of superchargers to enable us to reach much higher altitudes with our airplanes.

Trusting that the above data may assist in making the situation clear to you, I am,

Respectfully,

THURMAN H. BANE,
Major, Air Service, Chief Engineering Division.

To Hon. ROY G. FITZGERALD,
117 Forest Avenue, Dayton, Ohio.

Now, I want to call the committee's attention to page 840 of the record, where General Patrick, in answer to an interrogatory by the gentleman from Kansas, said:

Airplanes are not in the slightest degree standardized or stabilized. It is in a state of flux all the time and new things are being constantly developed. We have some brand-new things at Dayton that we are developing now. If the Air Service, either military or civilian, is to advance at all, there must be for years to come continued experimentation and research.

Now, on page 898 of the hearings General Patrick makes this statement:

General PATRICK. From the best information we have from abroad, sir, foreign nations are carrying on far more experimental work than we are along all sorts of lines, and they are subsidizing very heavily the aircraft operators. The French, for example, pay so much for each plane that a company purchases in order to enable it to carry on its aerial commercial ventures. The English have set aside some £600,000 to be expended during the next two or three years to encourage aviation, and the Belgians have done the same thing.

Subsidies are un-American, we are told, and yet we must compete against these policies for our commercial success and our national defense.

I want to direct attention to the fact that one of the two Wright brothers is still living. He has not a dollar's interest in the production of any type of aircraft, but is devoting his life to research work. I called upon him last Saturday after talking with the subcommittee, and he handed me this letter.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say here that Mr. Orville Wright is one of the two boys who invented the airplane, whose efforts were ridiculed, who would not be believed. The Government of the United States ignored their work. Their work was taken over by the Government in France. I went to see the great monument erected to their memory at Le Mans, in France, during the war. We came into the war without any kind of aircraft, and this Congress in feverish haste appropriated over a billion dollars to put airplanes on the front in France. In all the time of the war, with all of our money, with all of our ingenuity, we could not put a single fighting plane on the European front. I want now to read this letter from Orville Wright:

DAYTON, OHIO, March 18, 1922.

Hon. R. G. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Yankee ingenuity has done great things for America, and in time of war it has produced the ironclad Monitor, the Gatling gun, and other useful weapons. But more than Yankee ingenuity is required in the development of aircraft.

Military aircraft development can come only with long, hard, patient, scientific research. Only that machine will be useful which has been designed from the latest and most accurate scientific knowledge and has then been tested thoroughly before being put into process of manufacture. No part of an air program is so important as this.

McCook Field is now doing this work, and it is doing it well and efficiently. A curtailment of the work through a reduction of its appropriation would be most unfortunate. The appropriation now is not large enough. Economy in this case really is extravagance.

Very truly yours,

ORVILLE WRIGHT.

In connection with that I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Director of the Budget, who has never been accused of any particular liberality, approved an appropriation of $4,200,000 for this work. The committee in its wisdom has reduced this amount by $950,000. I have no criticism to make of the committee, because they have uniformly cut everywhere that there seemed to be a possibility of saving of money. If this country can learn anything by experience, which is the best teacher, and some say that fools can learn only by experience, then we have to judge of the future by the past, and if the one thing that looms up on the horizon as revolutionary in transportation is to be ignored in this country, although it is going ahead by leaps and bounds across the seas, if nations across the seas who can not afford to pay even the interest on the money they owe us can see the advantage of profiting by their experience in getting superiority over us both commercially and in a military way and are experimenting in research work on aircraft, then it seems to me that this Congress might consider it possible to review the action of the committee, and that the commitee might join me in requesting that that be done. [Applause.]

Gen. William Mitchell, our only flying general, has just returned from investigations in Europe. He has wired me as follows:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., March 22, 1922.

Congressman FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your telegram, any curtailment of our aviation research will be a great blow to our development and our position in aeronautics compared to other powers. All our technical aeronautical progress in America centers in our engineering division. Aeronautics is now the first line of defense of every country and its greatest prospective means of rapid communication commercially. Our advance in material depends on efficient research and at present our engineering section is as good as any. Give them at least half the chance that others are getting.

MITCHELL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no idea of handicapping in any way the very valuable work in experimentation and development in aircraft which is carried on at Dayton, Ohio. For the current year $4,300,000 was appropriated for that purpose. The state of the fund to-day is that $400,000 of that amount has been placed in reserve and probably will not be expended during the current year. The committee felt that appropriating $3,200,000 for that purpose would be fairly liberal for experimental and development work.

Take this view of the situation: Not only is the Army carrying on this valuable work in experimentation and development of the airplane activity, but the Navy is duplicating all of their work at their plant in Philadelphia. I do not know what their appropriation is, but it must be about the same as ours. As a matter of fact, those activities should be consolidated, and probably will be at some time, when the two departments can get together and build one plant and completely equip it, where this valuable work is carried on.

The intention of the War Department is not to continue the Dayton plant. They are seeking now a new location. They are handicapped at their Dayton plant by lack of room. McCook Field is in the city limits of Dayton, surrounded by buildings, trees, telegraph wires, and obstructions of that kind, which make it an unsafe landing field. The Army is anxious to get away. The House will probably recall that two years ago the committee endeavored to secure authority to purchase the Dayton-Wright plant, located 4 or 5 miles farther out in the country from McCook Field. The House refused to give authority to acquire that valuable property for experimental purposes, and made a mistake, I think, so that we are going to be forced to make a much larger appropriation than was asked for that plant to secure a new location. In the meantime the committee felt it would be unwise to go in for any additional experimental work other than that work carried on there now.

With the $3,250,000 we do not believe they will be curtailed in any essential work of experimentation. Their plan is, whenever they hear of a new airplane or airplane engine, to immediately buy one, order it shipped there, and proceed to experiment with it and demonstrate it. They have engaged in a large number of activities of that kind. The committee felt if they would concentrate their work on fewer types and carry them to successful conclusion that they would get better results in the end. Therefore, in conformity with the program of economizing we felt that we could safely reduce the amount to $3,250,000. I know it will be a disappointment to the Dayton Commercial Club and other organizations which have been frequently telegraphing us.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I think the disappointment will be much more widely spread than the Dayton Commercial Club. This is the home where the first experiments which were successful with regard to aircraft were made. Is it not true that the $400,000 was put in reserve because 350 men were ordered to be discharged, and is it not further true that that crippled the force?

Mr. ANTHONY. If 350 men were ordered discharged by the Secretary of War, he undoubtedly did it believing that he could dispense with their services.

Mr. BURTON. It was not the Secretary of War; it was by the Budget Bureau.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand how the Budget Bureau would have the power to discharge any men.

Mr. BURTON. It is so stated. No doubt word was sent to the Secretary of War.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One million dollars was ordered off the appropriation by the Budget Bureau, and $400,000 was taken from the research work, and immediately they discharged 350 men and disorganized the work.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the pay roll of the Dayton plant at McCook Field is scrutinized you will probably find more high salaries in the payment of mechanical and technical engineers that are employed there than in all of the other services of the Government combined. I am not saying that these men are not doing good and valuable work, but there are more well-paid mechanical and technical engineers there on the Government pay roll than you will find in all of the other activities.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does part of this agitation come because the Secretary of War thought he could dispense with the needless services of 350 men living in Dayton who help support the merchants of that town?

Mr. ANTHONY. The fact that 350 men were ordered discharged some time ago is news to the committee. We had not heard of it. I know that an order of that kind is immediately reflected in demands on Congress to appropriate more money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The chairman of the subcommittee stated that we failed to purchase the Dayton-Wright plant.

I was not much concerned whether we did that or not, because I do not know the facts. The Wilbur Wright Flying Field is in my district and therefore I have no interest from the standpoint of local influence, because it does not touch the field in my district where we are speaking about—the McCook Field. My interest is on the same line I heard the gentleman from Illinois three or four years ago when he spoke of the interest of giving assistance to the Bureau of Standards, not simply to keep a going concern progressing, but rather to find the things that are not yet known in the way of research. If this amount of money allowed will not interfere with this newest field we have, and in some ways certainly the most important, I join the committee, but I have had it represented to me in a convincing manner that this reduction will seriously cripple the research work.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would agree with the gentleman, and if it could be shown that the limitation of the appropriation would prevent the carrying on of developments of any particular type of engine or any particular type of plant I will be very glad to join with him in enlarging the appropriation. As far as known we find they can do just as good work with $3,200,000 as they could with $4,000,000, except probably they will have to lop off some demonstration and experimentation and a few of the less important types of engines and plants.

Mr. FESS. Over in that section they have established many records. They have made the world record in height reached, as the gentleman knows, and they are constantly making the effort to make and break the record that has been made. Again, this is one of the most important items in national defense, and everybody will admit that aircraft in that sense is an unknown field. We are yet in our infancy in aviation, and I think it would be really unfortunate and false economy to cut off any needed appropriation necessary to advance this most important field of research. I have been convinced that this will cripple the research work which ultimately will be a loss to us far beyond the money requested.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, it is that the chief to-day has reduced the work over there to the extent of a million dollars this year, and that of course is with the acquiescence of the President of the United States, because he is acting for him under the law. If it is, the President of the United States is crippling the service.

Mr. FESS. But the committee has reduced it below the Budget Director's recommendation a million dollars.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that. This year they have reduced it to the extent where they have put off 350 men.

Mr. FESS. I want to say to the gentleman I would not ask an appropriation merely to retain employees. I do not join that group. I want, however, sufficient money to employ research men doing this new work, and it seems to me that is exceedingly important.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it not true the Government maintains an independent bureau here called the Bureau of Aeronautics and which——

Mr. FESS. Well, that is true. But the vast and important work is done in the McCook Field.

Mr. DICKINSON. The chairman of the committee has stated here that it is duplicated by the Navy, and if there is research being done by the Bureau of Aeronautics how many times do we want to do these things?

Mr. FESS. I understand McCook Field is going ultimately to be removed to more commodious quarters, so that will clear me of any suspicion that there is any local interest in it. I have no concern about that at all. What I am concerned about is to get the best results with the expenditure of money in this new field.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman agree if the department withholds $400,000 of the current year's appropriation that certainly would be an intimation that we could reduce the appropriation next year by at least that amount?

Mr. FESS. Well, it appears that would be justified.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. May I have a moment on this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My information from the head of the Air Service is that the Director of the Budget demanded a saving of a million dollars from the entire appropriation for aviation; that $400,000 of that saving was apportioned to the research work, and so was cut off McCook Field. In the face of that and with that knowledge the Director of the Budget approves $4,200,000 as the appropriation for this year, and then the committee cuts that $950,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Director of the Budget has no power to curtail expenditures in any department which may be appropriated. Any curtailment of expenditures in any branch of the Government from the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1922 has been made as the result of an order by the Secretary of the department, and that is true as to all departments, and it is not the Budget officer. It is the Secretary of the department, and we must assume that he knows what he is speaking about; that it is not necessary to expend the money we have appropriated; that there will be turned back a certain amount of reserve saving, and if he continues to maintain the position he has held from the beginning that economy can be practiced; and he reserves to himself the right to say to every bureau chief under his administration that thus far shalt thou go and no further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 23, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out "$3,250,000" and insert "$3,850,000," taking off this $400,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 52, line 9, strike out the figures "$3,250,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,850,000."

Mr. FESS. Just a moment, in order to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] a question. Conceding that his position is correct, and I do concede it, does not the gentleman think in that work of research we ought to make an exception to the general rule of slicing recommendations?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the Secretary of War, when he made the order to put into reserve a certain amount of the appropriation, had in mind all the work that had to be done for research and all other kinds of work, and the information upon which we based our decision in reporting this appropriation leads to the conclusion that there would be no diminution in the research work of aviation, except that there would not be quite as many types of engines, perhaps, upon which to make the experiments as there would be if they had a larger sum, but that all the results could be obtained by making the research work on a fewer number that might be obtained by making the research on a larger number.

Mr. FESS. Does not the gentleman think that we are apt to get a greater percentage of results by using a larger number of types?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so, and I do not think anybody else thought so.

Mr. FESS. I join the gentleman in the general proposition. I make the exception, not as a matter of location but in the character of work done.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Agreeing with him as I do about research work, after all is not $3,000,000 a considerable sum to appropriate for research work along a particular line? And is there any other branch of the Government that has had that amount for research work along any particular line?

Mr. FESS. I can not answer comparatively. The amount seems very large. But I have confidence in men who have represented to me, such men as Mr. Wright, in whose scientific judgment I have great confidence, that this will cripple the work that is done over there.

Mr. MANN. Wright has done great work, the greatest that anybody in this world has ever done, as to flying. I doubt if all the work he has ever done, however, cost half of $3,000,000, except the commercial end of it.

Mr. FESS. That may be true. But after all, it seems to me that it is not really sound economy not to go to the maximum limit in this investigation at this time.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman it is not sound to cut off appropriations for real research. I think it is sound economy to cut off appropriations for fancy research, because if you give some of these so-called scientific gentlemen a billion dollars they will spend it like they did a billion dollars during the war for the Air Service, and not accomplish a thing.

Mr. FESS. That may be true in the case of the fanciful scientific fellows, but it is not true as to Mr. Wright.

Mr. STAFFORD. Just a word, Mr. Chairman. In the appropriation for this Air Service your committee has in no wise sought to unduly restrict the activities that are going on in experimental work. We have not sought in that connection to limit the salaries that are paid to these high-priced engineers. On page 836 of the hearings are detailed the salaries paid to over 630 of the technical men, ranging from $5,000 down to $3,000. We are not seeking to tell them that they should employ so many at such and such a salary, but the detailed estimates on page 896 show that more than one million and a quarter was to be used for the purchase of airplanes and accessories. And the testimony of General Patrick is to the effect that they wanted to purchase not only one of a certain type but many. Our committee realized they could proceed without purchasing any great number of experimental planes, but go ahead and purchase merely one or a very limited number. If you will examine the testimony closely you will see we are providing ample funds for this experimental work, notwithstanding the statement of the expert whose heart is in this work.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I find no fault with the salaries that are paid. I had not looked into that. But my friend will recall that not long ago a scientist on a very low salary made an investigation and a report that has brought to the Government an immense amount of money in the production of a certain product out of crude oil. I refer to Dr. Rittman. We find fault with having him do the work, when one discovery he makes will pay all the salaries that will be paid in that entire field.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are not restricting the salaries that are paid to these men. We are not placing any limit on the maximum as we do in certain activities. We give them free range.

Mr. FESS. Can you put a money value on the invention in aircraft?

Mr. STAFFORD. But we do say that there is no need for spending so much in the purchase of airplanes and accessories as they estimate.

Mr. FESS. That may be true.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that is the basis of our curtailment of the estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to say that that is the difficulty with this subcommittee. Seeking information as to what they have done and why, I was informed they cut out $500,000 from the appropriation designed for the purchase of aircraft lighter than air. After I traced it down I found there was no such thing. Now, I see that a member of the subcommittee is confounding the purchase of airplanes with research work. They do not need to purchase any quantities in research work and they do not purchase any quantities; not more than two or three of any design of any sort or kind of aircraft. What the testimony shows under that head is the purchase outside of their own appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the detail, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. On page 896, under the head of "Experimental and research, including pay and expenses of civilian employees," I read:

Airplanes, accessories, and their spare parts	$873,350
Airships, accessories, and their spare parts	247,000
Balloons, accessories, and their spare parts	27,700
Engines, accessories, and their spare parts, airplanes	395,000
Engines, accessories, and their spare parts, airships	40,000
Equipment, general, heavier-than-air, not otherwise covered by purpose code	20,000
Equipment, general, lighter-than-air, not otherwise covered by purpose code	70,000

If you take that into consideration, you will see that we are not in any wise crippling this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER SCHOOL.

For equipment and maintenance of the Engineer School, including purchase and repair of instruments, machinery, implements, models, boats, and materials for the use of the school, and to provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction of Engineer officers and troops in their special duties as sappers and miners; for land mining, pontooniering, and signaling; for purchase and binding of scientific and professional works, papers, and periodicals treating on military engineering and scientific subjects; for textbooks and books of reference for the library of the United States Engineer School; for incidental expenses of the school, including chemicals, stationery, hardware, machinery, and boats; for pay of civilian clerks, draftsmen, electricians, mechanics, and laborers; for compensation of civilian lecturers, and for payment of tuition fees of not to exceed 50 student officers at civil technical institutions in addition to the 2 per cent of commissioned officers authorized to attend technical, professional, and other educational institutions as provided for in section 127a of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920; for unforeseen expenses; and for travel expenses of officers on journeys approved by the Secretary of War and made for the purpose of instruction: Provided, That the traveling expenses herein provided for shall be in lieu of mileage and other allowances; and for other absolutely necessary expenses: Provided further, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscriptions for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation, $35,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. What is the necessity now of paying civilian lecturers for instructing men at this engineering school? Have we not Engineer officers enough in the Army to deliver lectures and give instruction to these men who attend this school?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I think we probably have as highly skilled men in the Engineer Corps as can be found anywhere in the country. But our Engineer officers work in close harmony with the leading technical institutions throughout the country and the leading mechanical and civil engineers and the heads of the largest manufacturing plants, and they deem it advisable to have these leading civil engineers come in, at merely nominal fees, to give the students the benefit of their knowledge. We feel that it is a good idea to have this infusion of outside knowledge both at West Point and at the War College and at the engineering school. About $2,000 is used in each place for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. That is a good explanation. How long do these students remain in the Army after they get that valuable instruction?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are supposed to devote their lives to it. They are nearly all officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. WALSH. This paragraph does not apply to the enlisted men at all?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not that kind of instruction; no.

Mr. WALSH. What has become of this appropriation that has heretofore been carried and which amounted, I think, in one year to $5,000,000 for vocational education, teaching them to be electricians and accountants and draftsmen and bookkeepers and farmers and professors and teachers and butchers and bakers and candlestick makers?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is going to be a limited amount of that work carried on in the Army next year, but it will all be done under the tuition of Regular Army officers or enlisted men.

The request for that appropriation did not show up this year from the War Department. I think the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts last year had a great deal to do with its disappearance. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. That is full compensation, to have the gentleman express that opinion, although "the gentleman from Massachusetts" cooperated with some other gentlemen.

Mr. ANTHONY. He had the full sympathy of many others.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that. This paragraph has no reference to that proposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it has no reference to that proposition. The men who visit the Engineer School and these other institutions are high-class technical men from the colleges and from the large manufacturing concerns.

Mr. MANN. May I ask how high a grade of officers they send to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, for instance?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are mostly the younger men whom they desire to give a larger degree of instruction in engineering than they receive at West Point. At West Point they get a smattering of a large number of things, and they devote only a part of their time to engineering.

Mr. MANN. They are supposed at West Point to absorb all the information that there is in the world. I appreciate that that is not quite possible. I wondered if they sent anything above lieutenants or captains.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think majors are included. Promotions have been so rapid in the Army in recent years that many of the rank of major are quite young in years and head for this additional engineering education.

Mr. WALSH. What is the nature of that section of the Revised Statutes that is made inapplicable?

Mr. ANTHONY. The average newspaper, especially a foreign periodical, requires payment in advance. This authorizes them to remit in advance.

Mr. WALSH. Particularly in Kansas?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think all over the country.

Mr. WALSH. A farm weekly, I understand, is published in Kansas, devoted to the uplift of agriculture. I understand that it is rather difficult to get that unless you subscribe in advance, or unless you happen to belong to a particular bloc.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is appreciated more by the farmers of Kansas than by the engineers of the Army.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I interject a remark that in another distinguished legislative body a vote has just been had on ratifying a supposed four-power treaty, with 67 for and 27 against? [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBSION. I do so for the purpose of asking the consent of the House to extend my remarks setting forth certain facts, and so forth, submitted to me by the United Mine Workers of the nineteenth district. It is information which they want Congress to have.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing certain information relative to the mine workers.

Mr. ROBSION. The coal situation and the proposed strike.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, this is not a resolution or memorial of the sort which usually goes through the basket, is it?

Mr. ROBSION. I want to extend my remarks by incorporating this. It is short.

Mr. WALSH. I say it is not the usual memorial which goes through the basket, is it?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; it is somewhat of a memorial. It sets forth certain facts and conditions.

Mr. WALSH. If it is going to be incorporated with the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will not object.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky how lengthy this is?

Mr. ROBSION. It is part of one page of typewriting; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, the United Mine Workers of District No. 19 have sent to me the memorial or resolutions hereinafter set out, with a request that it be brought to the attention of the Congress, and I hereby submit same to the Congress for its consideration:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Knoxville, Tenn., March 18, 1922.

Whereas the Bituminous Coal Commission appointed by Hon. Woodrow Wilson, then President of the United States of America, after a thorough investigation, awarded the bituminous coal miners throughout the country an increase in wages amounting to $1 per day on day wages, 24 cents per ton, and 20 per cent on all dead work; and

Whereas the miners and operators in district 19, comprising the mines of east Tennessee and southeastern Kentucky, met on April 13, 1920, and negotiated an agreement in keeping with the award, which agreement was signed and accepted by all operators in the above-mentioned territory to run concurrently until March 31, 1922; and

Whereas the coal operators appealed to the board of arbitration provided for in the agreement for a reduction of $2.50 per day on day wages, 24 cents off of the ton, and 20 per cent on dead work, which appeal was granted by the arbiter of the board under his award dated December 20, 1921, being effective as of December 1, 1921, and which award provided that the cost of living at the respective mines of the operators was to be decreased as much as possible; and

Whereas the miners throughout the district accepted the award and continued working; and

Whereas the coal operators are not yet satisfied, but are endeavoring to force further reductions, and in many places endeavoring to compel the miners to sign individual agreements, without permitting them to in any way participate in the negotiation of same; and

Whereas all miners who refuse to sign these individual agreements are not allowed to return to their jobs in the mines, but instead the operators have instituted court proceedings seeking to evict the miners, their wives, and children from their homes, these men having nowhere to take their families for shelter; and

Whereas the coal companies have failed to make effective that portion of the arbiter's award relating to lowering the cost of living and are still charging the miners about 35 per cent more than is charged for the same commodities in environing towns; and

Whereas the price of coal in the city of Knoxville, Tenn., runs from $6 to $8 per ton, being almost as high as it was prior to the operators being granted a reduction in wages: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the executive board of district 19, United Mine Workers of America, appeal to our United States Congress, through the Congressmen from the congressional districts having jurisdiction over these mines in east Tennessee and southeastern Kentucky, for a speedy investigation of these conditions and for relief for the miners, their wives, and little children in this district, that they may not be evicted from their homes.

Respectfully submitted.

DISTRICT 19, UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA.
Per S. A. KELLER, President.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER EQUIPMENT OF TROOPS.

For pontoon material, tools, instruments, supplies, and appliances required for use in the engineer equipment of troops, for military surveys, and for engineer operations in the field, including the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of the necessary motor cycles; the purchase and preparation of engineer manuals and procurement of special paper for same, and for a reserve supply of above equipment, $75,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, we have now reached the point in the bill where we read the other day, and I ask unanimous consent to return to page 4 of the bill, to the paragraph "Contingencies of the Army." My understanding is that the Clerk read that paragraph, but that the House took no action upon it, because it might be affected by any change in the size of the Army from that specified in the bill. As there was no change made in the provisions of the bill respecting the size of the Army, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph stand as read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the paragraph referred to stand as read by the Clerk. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the Clerk proceed with the next unread portion of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is on page 79.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that is on page 79, at line 22. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMING, EQUIPPING, AND TRAINING THE NATIONAL GUARD.

For procurement of forage, bedding, etc., for animals, $800,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be used to provide forage, bedding, etc., for more than 4,000 animals.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that paragraph on line 25, page 79, to strike out "$800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,002,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAGO: Page 79, line 25, strike out the figures "$800,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,002,800."

Mr. CRAGO. In support of this amendment I want to say that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL], who intended offering it, is necessarily absent from the Hall and asked me to offer it. This embraces the matter of the number of animals to be kept by the National Guard, which follows in the next section. Of course, if we fail to provide for the forage of these animals it will be useless to provide for the animals themselves. The Chief of the Militia Bureau has figured that this increase should amount to $1,600,000, but in figuring for the number of animals which the guard now has and would like to retain during the current year at the amount per annum which it is estimated is necessary to furnish forage, the calculation reached is the figures $1,002,800.

At the present time there have been issued to the National Guard units animals to the number of 8,009. The appropriation as it appears in the bill will furnish forage, bedding, and so forth, for only 4,000, or less than half the number of animals already issued and in care of the National Guard. If the figure is not changed every animal will have to go on half rations or 4,000 animals or more will have to be disposed of. This, of course, would prove a hardship to those who are engaged in the raising of horses. Again, the States have secured stable room and have prepared buildings for the housing of 8,000 animals, which they now have in their possession. To take away from them half these animals will create dissatisfaction in the States, as the accommodations have been provided by State funds.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CRAGO. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman agree to all that he is reading?

Mr. CRAGO. If I have read it correctly, I do. I may have made some misinterpretation of the words I intended to read.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman believe the Government ought to go into the purchase of animals simply to stimulate the raising of animals?

Mr. CRAGO. We have appropriated money for that very purpose. While I have never been very much in sympathy with that, we have appropriated money here to stimulate that industry because we hoped that when the necessity arose for the use of these animals in time of war or other emergency the country would have them. We have offered inducements along that line.

Mr. FESS. What are we coming to?

Mr. CRAGO. I think that is rather a little too socialistic myself. Many of these horses have been transported to their present locations at the expense of the State, due to the fact that the Federal Government has failed to provide adequate funds for transportation during the present year. If the organizations already in existence are to receive their proper equipment, which is incumbent by the act of June 4, 1920, the National Guard should now have in its possession 9,740 animals. It is fully realized that the maintenance of these animals is an expensive proposition, but I submit this change is necessary in order that the animals now in the hands of the States—approximately 8,000—be retained by the States. This amount does not contemplate issuance of additional animals to the National Guard during the fiscal year 1923. It merely contemplates the appropriation for the care and keep of the animals already in the possession of the National Guard units.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that these amendments and the other amendments which will naturally follow relating to the National Guard are of vital importance to this country, and there is no use of our talking of encouraging the National Guard of our country, and claiming that that is the one great unit which we must encourage, if we attempt at this early date to break down organizations which have been built up with so much trouble and so much care.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it is my intention to move that the committee rise at quarter of 5 o'clock. If the gentleman will allow me to have two minutes of his five minutes to make a statement, it is then my purpose to have this matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, with that understanding I shall be very glad to curtail my remarks upon this subject until we reach it when the bill is again under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. I want to leave this thought with the committee: It has not been an easy task to make these organizations in the National Guard conform to the tables of organization in the Army. They have been compelled to disrupt many of their organizations in order to build up these Artillery and Cavalry organizations, which they did not want to build up at first.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. What is going to become of the eight thousand and odd horses that have already been acquired? I have a letter here from the adjutant general of Massachusetts, and he brings up these points. He is very anxious to have some of these amendments and to know what is going to be done.

Mr. CRAGO. In my opinion, of course, they can be disposed of, but at the same time we will disorganize the organizations to which these animals were issued.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is our understanding that the purpose of the limitations that we have made as to the number of animals and on several of the National Guard appropriations are intended to effect a change in the present plan of organization of the guard with the idea of reaching a more reasonable cost, and I think the War Department admits the present plan is exceedingly expensive, and I think a change may meet with the approval of the War Department. I think it perhaps not advisable to proceed further to-night, but to take it up in the morning.

Mr. CRAGO. I agree to that, but I want to say to the gentleman that I do not agree with the War Department in their recommendations regarding the National Guard, and I do not believe the gentleman himself will be very insistent upon them when the time comes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the situation seems to be that there are 8,000 animals, for instance, now in the guard, and the department would like to have enough animals to raise that number to 9,200. We find that it is costing in excess of $200 per year to maintain an animal in the National Guard. It costs $109 in the Regular Army. Thirty-two animals are issued with each troop or battery in the National Guard. They have to be cared for, largely in livery stables, and we have to appropriate for caretakers, in addition to cost of forage, stables, and so forth. It is a big expense. One or two practical ideas have been presented to us. One is that these animals, especially in the smaller towns, should be allotted to members of the organization to take care of between the times they are used for drill purposes. For instance, different farmers would take the animals and care for them and keep them in condition, make light use of them for their keep with the understanding that they are to be returned to the organizations on the drill day.

That would relieve the Government entirely of the cost of maintenance, and it is believed by the committee to be very practical. Regardless of any such solution of the problem, our information is that the War Department has expressed its approval of the idea of so changing the organization of the guard as not to compel it to take on additional mounted organizations, or motor equipment and technical units, and expensive things of that kind so that we can effect quite a material saving along those lines. I am quite sure there is not a single member of the subcommittee who wants to injure the National Guard in the slightest degree.

In fact we are in full sympathy with its expansion and development but we did want to put a stop to the increased cost of maintenance of animals, motors, and tactical units.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to state that if we have 8,000 horses, and $100 to a horse, it will use up the $800,000. Does the gentleman think they can keep a horse for $100 a year?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. Under the provisions of the bill we would have to take half the animals from the guard. There is no question about that. We required the Regular Army to dispense with ten or fifteen thousand animals last year. They said they could not possibly get along without them. We did sell a number, but the War Department seems to have turned a lot of them over to the guard. The Regular Army got along very nicely by reducing its cost for animals, but they are eating up National Guard money at a rapid rate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not know but that the gentleman proposed to furnish 8,000 horses, and, of course, they could not be kept for $800,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10871, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. MILLER, until March 31, on account of visit to Muscle Shoals as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXTENSION OF AUSTRIAN DEBT FOR WHEAT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means I report Senate joint resolution 160 without amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that is a privileged bill; but anyhow I desire, if necessary, to reserve all points of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have given some thought to this and looked up some of the precedents, and I am of the opinion it is distinctly a revenue bill.

Mr. GARNER. It is a revenue bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It directly affects the revenues, just as the various Liberty loans that were put out.

Mr. GARNER. This bill, as I understand, deals with profits derived from the Grain Corporation. It deals, as I understand, with a loan this Government has made and extends the payment of interest. This loan was made by the Grain Corporation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It was made by the Grain Corporation out of the profits which the Grain Corporation made, which has gone into the Treasury.

Mr. GARNER. However, I reserve all points of order that can be had at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas reserves all points of order. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 160.

Joint resolution authorizing the extension, for a period of not exceeding 25 years, of the time for the payment of the principal and the interest of the debt incurred by Austria September 4, 1920, for the purchase of wheat from the United States Grain Corporation, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 25, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

575. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Lynns Bayou, Tex., including an entrance channel connecting with the harbor basin at Port Lavaca; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

576. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Little Wicomico River, Northumberland County, Va.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SNELL: Committee on War Claims. H. R. 5188. A bill for the relief of Orlando Ducker, major and surgeon in War with Spain (Rept. No. 829). Laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MOORES of Indiana: Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers. House Report No. 828. A report on the disposition of useless papers in the Post Office Department. Ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LANKFORD: A bill (H. R. 11038) to provide for the experimentation in and to promote and establish the sale of farm products directly from the producer to the consumer; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11039) to provide for experimentation in and to promote and establish the sale of watermelons and cantaloupes directly from the producer to the consumer; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 11040) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the sale of the marine hospital reservation in Cleveland, Ohio," approved July 26, 1916; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. McCLINTIC: A bill (H. R. 11042) to prohibit speculation in grain and food products; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: A bill (H. R. 11043) to amend the national prohibition act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CAREW: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York, urging the continuing of work in the Brooklyn Navy Yard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MEAD: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York, urging the continuing of the operation of the navy yard at Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, urging the passage of the Towner-Sterling bill, known as the education bill; to the Committee on Education.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, urging the recognition of the Mexican Government and also President Obregon by the United States Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, urging adjusted compensation for the soldiers and sailors of the World War; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TAGUE: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, memorializing Congress in favor of the passage of Federal law to further regulate the use of narcotic drugs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor of women and minors; to the Committee on Labor.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 11044) granting a pension to Ellen A. Mealia; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FITZGERALD: A bill (H. R. 11045) granting a pension to Dennis Higgins; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11046) granting a pension to Patrick Brosnan; to the Committee on Pensions.

4826. Also, petition of the National Association of Oxychloride Cement Manufacturers, of New York City, N. Y., relative to the pending tariff bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4827. Also, petition of the Grain Trade Association of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, favoring light wines and beer; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

4829. By Mr. SNELL: Petition of sundry citizens of St. Regis Falls, N. Y., favoring the passage of the Voigt bill (H. R. 8086); to the Committee on Agriculture.

4830. By Mr. SWING: Petition of various citizens of Fullerton, Calif., protesting against House bill 9753, providing for compulsory Sunday observance; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

4831. Also, petition of citizens of National City, Calif., protesting against compulsory Sunday observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 25, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

RECOGNITION OF PRESIDENT OBREGON.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received copies of memorials adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona. According to my view memorials and resolutions adopted by the legislature of a State or by either house of a State legislature should be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the rule requires that.

Mr. ASHURST. I therefore present and ask for inclusion in the RECORD Senate memorial No. 1, urging our Secretary of State to recognize the Obregon government in Mexico.

Article 2, section 3, of the Federal Constitution contains the expression from which we draw our impression that the executive branch of the Government is the only authority in our Government authorized to recognize the existence of new nations or to receive ambassadors and other public ministers.

It will be understood that the Legislature of Arizona is not attempting to interfere in affairs in which it has no proper function, but the legislature of a State, or either house thereof, has the undoubted right under our form of government to express an opinion on such a subject, and the Senate of the Legislature of Arizona has adopted this resolution in the belief that such expression of its opinion will assist the State Department in the settlement of this problem.

Senate memorial No. 1 was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Senate memorial 1, fifth State legislature, first special session, State of Arizona.

IN THE STATE SENATE.

To the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to Arizona's Representatives in Congress:

Your memorialists, the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona, in special session assembled, do respectfuly represent:

That being a "border State" and adjacent to the great State of Sonora, of the Republic of Mexico, Arizona is keenly alive to the problems now confronting, and which for a decade past have confronted, the said Republic of Mexico.

That your memorialists, men of affairs of the State of Arizona, chosen from the mining and cattle interests, mercantile life, and the professions, see with the clearness born of intimate relationship the magnificent struggle that has been waged, the seemingly insurmountable obstacles that have been overcome by the new-born Republic of Mexico, and the glorious achievements that have been attained by the unselfish devotion to duty, the untiring energy, the honesty of purpose, and tenacious will to lead his countrymen into the peaceful enjoyment of harmonious brotherhood, by Alvaro Obregon, President of Mexico.

That from a chaos thereto unknown and a misery never before experienced in the Western Hemisphere, Mexico has in less than one and one-half years emerged triumphant and to-day faces the dawn of national achievement, seeking from her strong northern neighbors her just recognition that she may be enabled to take her place in the God-given light of national equality.

That but one short year ago Arizona—in the spirit of western manhood expressed her faith in Mexico and in the man who, like our own illustrious Washington, had as soldier and statesman led his people to a safe and lasting peace—by a memorial to the Congress of the United States prayed for such recognition. That quickly following the lead of Arizona similar messages of confidence and faith were speeded to the Congress from the States of California, Texas, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Maryland, Illinois, and Michigan, representing 40,000,000 souls, urging the immediate recognition of Mexico.

That to-day is witnessed in Mexico an era of industry and prosperity plainly indicative of permanent peace; farming and ranching restored, industrial and mining activities steadily increasing. During the 15 months' occupancy of the presidency by Alvaro Obregon no American or other foreigner in Mexico has been killed: It is therefore

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona in special session assembled, That time has amply demonstrated the statesmanship of the President of Mexico, his clarity of vision and singleness of purpose to place his country firmly amongst the great stable governments of the earth; that Mexico is no longer a belligerent nation, torn with internal strife, but a country of peaceful pursuits and honorable ambitions, and that no good reasons, no just causes exist further to deny to it the just recognition which the United States of America itself achieved only after its baptism of blood: It is therefore further

Resolved, That the President be requested to recommend to the Congress of the United States that full recognition be extended to the Republic of Mexico and to its President, the Hon. Alvaro Obregon: It is also further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST and Hon. RALPH CAMERON, United States Senators, and Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Congressman, and that they each be requested and urged to use all honorable means to further the prayed-for recognition of Mexico. Also, that an engrossed copy be transmitted to the Hon. Alvaro Obregon, President of the Republic of Mexico.

Adopted by unanimous vote of the senate March 17, 1922.

Mr. ASHURST. I also ask that a pamphlet written by Mr. Chester W. Hansen, entitled "Mexico and Obregon," be included in the RECORD; likewise an article entitled "It is time to accord recognition to President Obregon and Mexico," by Hon. William Randolph Hearst.

I also desire at this point to ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a letter from our Secretary of State giving the information as to the number and names of other Governments that have recognized the Obregon government.

May I secure such permission before I pass to another subject?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEXICO AND OBREGON.

(By Chester W. Hansen.)

A STATEMENT OF FACT WITH REGARD TO EXISTING CONDITIONS IN MEXICO AND POLICY OF THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION.

In May, 1920, the present administration came into power in Mexico. General Obregon, though always considered the moving spirit of the new government, refused to assume the rôle of executive until requested to do so by the people at their duly called and regulated election. Adolpho de la Huerta, therefore, after being formally elected by Congress, took the oath as provisional President and functioned in that capacity until the inauguration of Obregon in December, 1920, after his election by an overwhelming majority on September 8, 1920. At this election military force was entirely absent and not one single instance of disorder at the polls was reported. General Obregon received more than 1,000,000 votes. Considering the population of Mexico (16,000,000), 1 person in every 16 cast a ballot for him. Ex-President Wilson in 1912 received slightly over 6,000,000 popular votes, or slightly less than 1 for each 18 of population.

This comparison conclusively shows that his election expressed the will of all of the people and was not the mock affair which so many agencies would have us believe.

The United States elections of 1916 and 1920 can hardly be used for comparative purposes because of women's suffrage, which is not applicable to Mexico.

President Obregon laid down a specific course to be pursued. These policies speak for themselves, and the wisdom and justice of them can not nor have they ever been questioned. Their execution and the sincerity of the promulgators have been questioned. Therefore I submit a few extracts of policy, together with accomplishments to date, so that the reader may himself judge the spirit prompting the actions of the administration and their sincerity of purpose.

Permit me to quote from a statement by President Obregon of June 26, 1921, to the New York World:

"The States of Texas, Arizona, and California, acting independently and without the slightest inspiration, have made official requests upon Washington for resumption of formal relations that will permit proper and complete expressions of friendship between Mexico and the United States. The action of these States, so intimately in contact with my country, tells it own story of peace and order along the border at the moment of writing."

[NOTE.—Since above was written the States of Michigan, Illinois, and Oklahoma, as well as the chambers of commerce of the cities of St. Louis, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and others have without inspiration done likewise. This action was taken after thorough personal investigation and first-hand observation by their representative members on various trade trips through Mexico.]

"To-day there is not a single armed force in the field against the Federal authority."

[NOTE.—This condition has continuously prevailed to date. Even the ever-rebellious Yaqui Indian, who has been in a state of steady revolt since the time of the Spanish conquest, throughout the rule of the great Juarez and the iron Diaz, has laid down his weapons of war and turned, contented, to peaceful, constructive pursuits.]

"Reconciliation is our fixed policy. We mean to end every hate as far as possible and heal every division.

"One of the first things that the revolution did was to call in every history that taught the youth of our country to hate the United States and Spain."

[NOTE.—Though handicapped by lack of funds, hundreds of schools, with volunteer corps of instructors, have been established and maintained throughout even the remotest sections of the Republic as a nucleus of the educational system to come. Arrangements are practically complete for interchange of scholarships with American universities and interchange of professors as well. This interchange of students and professors can not help but form a solid foundation for continued friendship, based upon actual knowledge secured through continued residence and study in the respective countries. President Obregon has already made liberal financial contribution for the furthering of this cause through the Mexican-American scholarship foundation.]

"The truest test of peace and order, however, is to be found in our army figures. On June 10, 1920, the army establishment of Mexico numbered 23,767 officers and 105,066 men. To-day (June 26, 1921) the army numbers 16,784 officers and 77,289 men, an annual saving of $36,500,000. This is not the end by any means."

[NOTE.—Since the above was written the army has been still further reduced and announcement made of continued further reductions.]

"Instead of carrying the paper money issues as a continuing internal obligation, with all of the disastrous results which that would have meant, we abolished the issuance of currency, retired the issues in circulation quickly and on as just a basis as possible, and placed business on a gold basis * * * our internal debt has been saved from a new burden, and we are in a better position to take care of our external obligations."

[NOTE.—To-day the entire commerce of Mexico, both internal and external, is conducted on a gold basis—nothing but metal medium is in circulation. Billions of dollars worth of currency, of many issues and doubtful value, were retired in favor of a gold standard.]

"It is not possible to turn in a day to the instant and satisfactory settlement of complicated problems and unknown claims throughout the revolution. However, we stated repeatedly that Mexico would not repudiate any just obligations. We have always paid our debts. We always will pay our debts. We have seen a loan of $20,000,000 received in 1824, changed magically into a debt of more than $100,000,000. We have seen Maximilian sign an obligation for $40,000,000 in return for a loan of $20,000,000. We have seen Miramon, the counter-revolutionist, sign a note for $15,000,000 in return for a loan of $750,000. Yet not once, even under these outrageous burdens, have we ever advanced the idea of repudiation. Throughout the revolution we stated repeatedly that Mexico would meet every just obligation without evasion. It is a promise that will be kept to the letter. Even now we are planning the machinery that will settle all claims in accordance with the principle laid down by international law. Nor should it be forgotten that as late as six months ago we urged our creditors to send a committee to Mexico for conferences in the interest of fair and honest settlements. Strangely enough, acceptance of the frank invitation has been prevented by various governmental pressure, and to date Mexico has not been able to secure these face-to-face meetings that are her desire."

[NOTE.—Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, a representative of the International Committee of Bankers on Mexico, is now in that country in response to a further invitation from the Mexican Government. To date no action has been taken by our Government in regard to participation in conferences invited by Obregon to discuss ways and means of arriving at equitable adjustment of claims. It can be readily conceived that Americans fleeing Mexico at the instance and persuasion of our Government, who later filed claims with our State Department for damages caused by confiscation, etc., during the revolution, would place their damages at a maximum, and such claims are certainly subject to adjustment.]

"Foreign capital will be invited and given every justice * * *. Every private right acquired prior to May 1, 1917, when the new constitution was adopted, will be accepted and fully protected. The famous article 27, one section of which declares the nation's ownership of subsoil rights in petroleum, will never be given retroactive effect, nor has it ever been given retroactive effect. * * *

"Here are the figures for exportation of Mexican oil year by year since 1917:

	Barrels.
1917	42,545,852
1918	51,768,110
1919	77,703,289
1920	151,058,257
1921 (January to May, inclusive)	76,493,564
1921, probable production	190,000,000

"Does this steady increase indicate that the Mexican Government has been placing any obstacles in the way of development?"

[NOTE.—August 30 the Supreme Court of the United States of Mexico rendered a decision to the effect that article 27 could not be construed retroactively.]

"As for recent tax increases, the necessity should be clear to all. Every country in the world has had to increase its taxes in order to meet increased expenses. In addition, Mexico is facing delinquent obligations that must be met. The increase in petroleum, for instance, is for specific application to our foreign debt. To this purpose, and this purpose alone, the entire proceeds of the tax will be devoted. I stated this clearly in the decree that established the tax, and there will be no departure from it. To call the tax confiscation, as the oil group is doing, is absurd, * * * for even while earning enormous dividends out of the oil taken from Mexican wells it is still unwilling for Mexico to receive even an appreciable share of its natural wealth as an aid in meeting the just demands of the holders of our foreign obligations. It is these dividends that give the best answer to the cry of confiscatory taxation. The net profits of the Mexican Petroleum Co. in 1920, after depreciation and taxes, were $9,773,898. (This on a capitalization of $48,000,000.) Its interlocked associate, the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., declared net profits of $12,987,757 in 1920, after deducting interest charges, taxes, and contingencies. The British American Petroleum Co., another rich subsidiary formed in order to avoid the scandal of lumped earnings, showed a profit of $5,000,000 in 1920. It will thus be seen that the Doheny group pumped close to $28,000,000 in net profits out of the soil of Mexico in the single year of 1920."

[NOTE.—During August, 1921, the American group of oil producers of Mexico, represented by W. C. Teagle, president of the Standard Oil Co.; E. L. Doheny, president Mexican Petroleum Co.; H. F. Sinclair, president Sinclair Oil Co.; J. W. Van Dyke, president Atlantic Refining Co.; and Amos L. Beatty, president Texas Co., attended a series of conferences with officials of the Mexican Government, the result of which was the announcement by the American committee that a satisfactory taxation agreement had been reached, and they began the exportation of oil the day following. The text of this agreement has not as yet been made public. A few days later the Mexican Petroleum Co. declared its regular quarterly dividend (12 per cent annually) which throughout the entire period of the taxation controversy had been neither postponed nor reduced.]

It would be exceedingly difficult for anyone to elaborate on the above. The policies speak for themselves and the accomplishments to date sustain them sufficiently to compel the confidence of the world in the assurance that they will be carried out to their fullest limit.

I do, however, wish to call the attention of the reader to a few facts, which reflect the success of the policies of the present administration during the short period in which they have been in power.

The Government of Mexico took over the railroads during time of stress in much the same manner that the United States took over our railways during the recent war. These are being rapidly returned to their owners, but only as they are restored to their normal state. As to the wisdom of this policy, we need look no further than the chaotic condition in which we find our railroads to-day and the hundreds of millions of dollars of claims against our Government because of the conditions surrounding their return to private ownership. One railway in Mexico has already been returned, the Mexican Railway, a British property extending from Vera Cruz to Mexico City. This was possible because of its small mileage and the fact that it has suffered least. The Southern Pacific Railroad, with its large mileage, was never taken over by the Government. Every cent of railroad revenue is being devoted to reconstruction in a vigorous attempt to restore them to their normal condition. In the past few months $5,000,000 of the Government's own funds have been spent for rolling stock, and the day is near at hand when the national lines can be returned to their owners in such shape as to make damage claims fairly simple of ascertainment and adjustment.

When consideration is given to the fact that Mexico has a far greater railroad mileage per capita than either the United States, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, or Italy, the task which confronted them in the rehabilitation of these lines can more easily be realized.

The following figures prepared by the United States Department of Commerce show the actual railroad mileage of these countries for each 10,000 inhabitants:

United States	2.5
Italy	3.2
United Kingdom	5.1
Germany	5.8
France	8.5
Mexico	10.2

Land taxation is being readjusted on a basis which will make the holders of vast acreage bear their just proportion of taxes, and will in itself compel these holders to either subdivide and dispose of or develop their holdings. Land banks have been established, and a plan of rural credits is in the process of formation. Colonization schemes are under way and great irrigation projects are being worked out. It is the hope of the administration to in a short time double the arable acreage of the nation. The Mexican is at heart an agriculturist. Encouragement and assistance is all that is necessary to make for tremendously increased agricultural development.

The attitude of the Mexican citizen toward the American is one of friendship, spectacular propaganda to the contrary notwithstanding. A few months ago the author communicated with several hundred leading American business men in every section of the United States who had recently visited Mexico. He requested their opinions. Of the hundreds of replies received not one expressed anything but the strongest feeling that the present administration should be recognized without delay, and were pleasingly surprised at the sincere demonstration of friendship toward the Americans and at what they saw. Extracts from a number of the letters are attached.

Our exports to Mexico have increased from $41,066,775 in 1915 to $131,455,101 in 1919, $143,786,000 in 1920, and the first seven months of 1921 shows exports of $155,699,499, an increase of 61 per cent over the same period in 1920. With one exception Mexico was the only country to whom our exports increased during that period—our total exports showing a decrease of 42 per cent. Significant of this is the fact that no complaints arising out of our Mexican commerce during that period have been filed with the State Department, while those arising out of trade with other Latin-American countries were considerable.

The national debt of Mexico per capita is by far the lowest of any major country in the world. Note the following comparison:

England	$824.78
Italy	396.60
France	1,114.26
Germany	797.57
Canada	290.00
Mexico	24.34

[NOTE.—Above figures taken from report of international financial conference, called by League of Nations at Brussels, July, 1921. Of further importance is the fact that all of Mexico's loans were incurred during a period when low interest rates prevailed. Her interest per capita per annum, therefore, presents even a more striking comparison than the above.]

Attached are statements by Samuel M. Vauclain, president Baldwin Locomotive Works, and Elmer Dover, financier of Tacoma, Wash., and former secretary of the National Republican Committee. These men are leaders in their lines of endeavor in this country. Their judgment and ability to analyze a situation, as well as their Americanism and honesty of purpose, is most certainly unquestioned. These men have very recently been in Mexico—have seen the existing conditions and unbiasedly studied them. Their opinions must be given worthy consideration.

President Obregon and his administration stand squarely on the policies they have established and ask us to judge their ability to carry them out and their sincerity of purpose by their administration to date.

Mexico asks no quarter, but is keenly sensitive of the good which can only spring from whole-hearted cooperation with this country, and rising phœnix-like from out the ashes of 10 years of chaos and revolution, extends to us the hand of friendship. Shall we accept her offer so sincerely made, or shall we compel her to look across the seas for the friendship which should so rightly come from us—her big brother—whose aims and aspirations are identical?

It is Time to Accord Recognition to President Obregon and Mexico.

(By William Randolph Hearst.)

WHY WE SHOULD RECOGNIZE THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT.

(There was ample reason why the United States should not recognize the Government of Carranza, which was nothing more than an authorized state of protracted anarchy; but what reason is there why we should not recognize the established and universally supported government of General Obregon, which has almost entirely restored law and order and civilized conditions in Mexico; a government which not only maintains the peaceful and ethical conditions of civilized society, but offers the friendship and encouragement to citizens of the United States in Mexico which have so long been denied them?)

THE OBREGON GOVERNMENT SHOULD NOW BE RECOGNIZED.

[Published August 24, 1921.]

Why do not the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico come to an agreement that will properly protect the citizens of the United States and permit the recognition by the United States of the present government of Mexico, which is eminently a good government?

President Obregon is a capable, conservative man. He has largely restored law and order and civilized conditions in Mexico. He is very friendly to Americans. It would seem very difficult to secure in all Mexico a better man for President than General Obregon. Therefore, if recognition of President Obregon's government will help him in his task of fully restoring peace and order in his country—a task which all the world, and our country particularly, must sincerely desire to see accomplished—why can not an agreement be reached which will bring about that recognition on terms equally satisfactory to Mexico and to the United States?

The United States can not expect that Mexico will surrender her sovereignty as an independent nation and consent to any definite limitation of her just powers and privileges of government, nor can Mexico expect that the United States will ever again maintain the shameful indifference to the lives and the property rights of her citizens that this country exhibited during the Wilson administration.

There has been but one such administration in the whole history of this Nation, and, please God, there will never be another.

No more will the policies of our great country be determined by the exaggerated egotism of one unbalanced autocrat. No more will an affront to his vanity plunge the Nation into war, while murder and outrage of American citizens and insults to the whole Nation are passed unheeded.

The present administration of the United States Government is characteristically American. It regards itself as the servant of the people, placed in power to protect their interests.

This administration will surely permit no encroachment upon the just rights of its citizens in Mexico or elsewhere.

Starting with that assumption, or rather with that obvious fact, and starting, also, with the evident inclination of the Mexican administration to be very well disposed toward Americans, there should be no difficulty in reaching an agreement between the two nations which will properly define what adequate protection of American rights and interests means under international law and usage.

Then let the United States promptly proceed to recognize the government of General Obregon and to give that able executive full support in the great task of reconstruction and rehabilitation that he has so capably and courageously assumed.

Peace throughout the world is the earnest desire of the people of the United States, but particularly to be desired are peace, order, and prosperity in Mexico, which is our immediate neighbor and which for many years preceding this last insurrection had been our good neighbor and good friend.

And since peace and order and prosperity in Mexico and restored friendship between Mexico and the United States are our desire as a people and as a Government, let us do our best to help secure it by a generous attitude toward Mexico and her established government.

MEXICAN RECOGNITION PROBLEM FOR PEOPLE OF AMERICA TO SOLVE.

EL PASO, TEX., October 17, 1921.

President Obregon, of Mexico, has given an interview to representatives of the press which contains statements sadly discouraging to those who are anxious to see the most cordial relations developed between the United States and Mexico.

President Obregon says that official representatives of Mexico will not be present at the convention of nations to be held at Washington. This is genuinely distressing to Americans who believe in the policy of "Amerca first" and the cultivation of friendly conditions and relations in America first.

There might be representatives of Armenia, Eurania, China, Korea, Siam, the Kongo Free State, Liberia, or any kind of nation or psuedonation in distant Europe, Asia, Africa, and Australia at the historic assembly in Washington, but there will be no representative of peace and good will from our important immediate American neighbor and sister Republic of Mexico.

Why? What is the reason that the Government of the United States of America does not recognize the present stable government of the Republic of Mexico?

There was ample reason why the United States should not recognize the government of Carranza, which was nothing more than an authorized state of protracted anarchy; but what reason is there why we should not recognize the established and universally supported government of General Obregon, which has almost entirely restored law and order and civilized conditions in Mexico; a government which not only maintains the peaceful and ethical conditions of civilized society but offers the friendship and encouragement to citizens of the United States in Mexico, which have so long been denied them?

What is the United States asking of the Mexican Government in return for recognition which the Mexican Government is unwilling to grant? The principle of our demand should be supremely simple. We should ask nothing of Mexico that we would not freely and fully grant to Mexico if that country made the request of us. And Mexico for its part should withhold no right from our citizens in Mexico which it would not wish withheld from its citizens in the United States.

This is the plain principle of the golden rule applied to international relations, and it applies as aptly to politics and diplomacy as it does to religion, morality, business activity, and all phases of human society.

The situation between the United States and Mexico needs light. It needs the light of publicity. It is time that some of the fine phrases propounded by Mr. Wilson and never practiced by him were actually put into political operation by the present more practical and apparently more genuine American administration of President Harding.

What has become of the plan to abolish secret diplomacy, for which as one object our idealistic American youth sacrificed their lives? What has become of the open covenants openly arrived at which were so inspiring a watchword in our self-sacrificing crusade for democracy?

Let us make our negotiations with Mexico a matter of democratic diplomacy. Let us take our citizens, whose widom we so highly extol and so constantly ignore, into the confidence of government. Let us make our public policy public. Is our Government negotiating with Mexico for the rights of our whole citizenship or for the special advantage of certain financial interests?

Friends of the administration naturally suppose that the Government is considering only the public interest, but when Lamont, spokesman of the international bankers, rushes into print to say what shall be done in regard to Mexico some citizens feel justified in entertaining a mild suspicion as to our purposes, or at least as to our agencies.

Why should our Government be mysterious about its demands? Why should Mexico be secretive about its reply? There are more than technicalities at stake in this negotiation; there are the friendship and the intimate political, social, and commercial relations of two great republican nations which are neighbors and which want to progress together in harmony and amity, in cordiality and healthful cooperation. It is the province of statesmen to find ways and means to enable them so to progress.

The obstacles which stand in the way of recognition and cordial relations should be dissipated by actual concession and consideration. If statesmen can not solve the problem, let the public know the facts. The combined wisdom and friendly disposition of the people of the two sister republics will accomplish the results which both desire.

WHAT I FOUND IN A MONTH'S TRIP THROUGH MEXICO—THE COUNTRY IS NOW ORDERLY, SAFE FOR NATIVES AND FOREIGNERS, WELL GOVERNED, HAPPY AND PROGRESSIVE.

EL PASO, TEX., November 10, 1921.

I have just returned to the United States after an interesting month in Mexico.

If any American business men are anxious to know whether life and property are safe in Mexico, I can only cite for their information my own life and my own properties.

I have properties in the north of Mexico and in the south of Mexico. These properties were in continual trouble and turmoil during the several preceding administrations, but have been in complete peace and security during the administration of President Obregon.

Furthermore, to speak perfectly frankly, I would not have cared to venture personally into Mexico during some of these previous administrations or maladministrations, but under this present administration I have traveled through Mexico by railroad, by automobile, and by horseback, not only in the thickly populated centers, but also over infrequented highways and byways, both by day and by dead of night, and I have never experienced the slightest inconvenience nor witnessed the slightest disorder.

All the Americans whom I met in Mexico have had practically the same experience that I have had and none of them can understand why the United States Government recognized the Carranza administration, which could not and did not protect American life and property in Mexico, and why our Government does not recognize the Obregon administration, which can and does protect American lives and interests.

My viewpoint is purely the American viewpoint. I say that without hesitation.

When a Mexican administration was indifferently permitting the killing and outraging of Americans, I was for intervention, but when any Mexican administration is protecting Americans in their lives and liberties, I am for recognition of that competent and friendly administration.

This protection of Americans is, I think, the main matter to be considered by our American people and by our American Government. But, of course, President Obregon has done much more than merely protect Americans. He has protected his own people. He is restoring law and order and popular rights and liberties completely throughout his whole country and for all classes, rich and poor alike.

He is not a partisan of any class or clique. He is not playing favorites. He is endeavoring to do absolute justice. And it is because he is resting his orderly social and governmental structure upon the firm foundation of equal justice that I believe the peace and prosperity of Mexico will be permanent.

As a matter of fact, the principles and policies of President Obregon seem to me so sound and sincere that I could wish that some of our own statesmen would learn a lesson from him.

To illustrate all that I have said above, let me review in some detail my trip through Mexico. When I left Los Angeles I was told not to go into Mexico by way of El Paso and Chihuahua, as the railroad was in terrible condition and was infested by bandits. The trip to Mexico City was much longer, however, by way of Laredo, so I determined to go by way of El Paso and Chihuahua. I found the roadbed to be on the average quite as good as our American roadbeds, and I found no bandits whatever, nor anything that resembled a bandit from one end of the road to the other.

I stopped at various towns along the route to investigate conditions—at Aguas Calientes, at Silao, at the great mining town of Guanajuato, at Irapuato, in the center of a great agricultural district, at Celoya, and at Queretaro, famous in the history of Mexican independence. I went through these towns usually in the street cars, talked with the people as best I could, and as none of them rose in protest against my bad Spanish, I felt justified in concluding that they were at present at least a patient and peaceful lot.

In Mexico City itself I found the city considerably increased in size and population. It is now said to number a population of approximately a million. The streets are thronged, the shops are busy. The newspapers are lively and full of advertisements. The theaters are many and well patronized, and life seems to be going along as it does in any other big metropolis.

Certainly the city is well policed and as safe by night as by day.

I do not mean to say that there is no crime in Mexico, but apparently there is no more than there is in New York or any other big city, while the police in Mexico are extraordinarily prompt and efficient in their detection and arrest of criminals. While in Mexico City I read that the pay car on one of the railroads had been robbed and $75,000 stolen. In 24 hours the police had captured the thieves and had recovered the money.

In some of the papers I read of a mail robbery of $500,000 in New York City. These thieves have not yet been arrested and this money has not yet been recovered.

I rode through the various suburbs of Mexico City in an automobile, and found the people everywhere contentedly attending to their businesses. I went over the mountains to Cuernavaca and talked with Gov. Jose Porres there. He said that his State had been in complete quiet for about a year and that everything had settled back into the regular routine of civilized society. That statement meant much, because this region had been the stamping ground of the terrible Zapata, the most savage and destructive of Indian banditti who sprang up during the revolutionary period. Now, however, the town of Cuernavaca is in complete quiet. The surrounding country as far as the eye can see from portals of the old palace of Cortez is thriving in the peaceful pursuit of agriculture.

On my return to Mexico City I had a long and extremely interesting interview with President Obregon.

I found him quite confident that his country was completely and permanently restored to peace and order. The just and legitimate objects of the revolution had been accomplished. The Government had been wrested from the narrow, selfish control of the great landed aristocracy. A government of the people, by the people, and for the people had been substituted, with rotation in office instead of a permanent dictatorship. The greatest good of the greatest number was the prime object of the Government. The people were contented because of the more liberal social and government conditions. They were prosperous, because they received a greater measure of the fruits of their industry. Peace was based on satisfaction with better conditions—order established upon recognized justice and equity.

President Obregon is a man who inspires confidence both in the excellence of his purposes and in his ability to carry his plans through to successful operation. He has a strong face, which portrays much force of character, but he has a pleasant smile, which gives evidence of a kindly disposition, and also an acute sense of humor.

Like our great President Lincoln, however, he likes to give special point to his statements by a joke or a good story. He is a very human man. He speaks without pose or affectation, but with great dignity and impressiveness. He is a man of many-sided abilities—a successful business man, the possessor of large wealth, a brilliant military man, the most successful general the revolution produced, a wise diplomat, as proven by his clever handling of the Villa situation, and a powerful executive, as shown by the achievements of his administration to date. It is doubtful if another man in Mexico could be found with all the qualities so necessary for the successful handling of the reconstruction situation, and if our country can strengthen President Obregon's hands by recognition, and so help him in his great work, it would seem to be the worst of bad judgment for it not to do so.

President Obregon told me that he hoped that I would go not only to the big centers, where most Americans went, but to some of the more distant districts in my tour. As this was also very much in accord with my own desires, I determined on my way back to the United States to go to the far end of some of the branch railways and then make horseback trips from there into the interior. I went, therefore, to Uruapan first—the end of a line—and rode from there through coffee plantations and banana plantations and ranches and rice fields. Everywhere I saw the people at work and apparently glad to be at work developing the products of their fields and farms.

Then I went through Guadalajara to Colima, well down toward the west coast. There was considerable evidence of revolutionary destruction here, in razed buildings and looted churches, but all was peace and quiet now and the work of restoration was in full progress. I rode from Colima all day and far into the night through the surrounding plantations up to the base of the great volcano. I saw nothing but order and industry.

Returning late that night through deep barrancas and by lonely roads under the dim light of a thin moon, there was every opportunity for adventure, but none occurred. We passed occasional groups of horsemen or plodding peons, but we were never molested. If we were accosted at all it was only with a courteous "Adois, Señor," "God be with you, Señor," and sometimes I felt that we had need to have God with us in these solemn solitudes amid subtropical jungles, but we traveled in peace and returned in safety. All, too, without other guard than our guide, an aged Mexican, who looked like a bandit, but talked and acted like the caballero that he was.

When we got back to our car I gave him a gun in gratitude. He weighed it approvingly and said that if ever I had need he would gladly use it in my defense.

I said that I would remember, but that I thought I would never have greater need than I might have had that very night, which remark I meant rather seriously, but which he considered a bit of pleasantry and laughed at it accordingly.

For the Mexicans themselves believe that their country is completely restored to peace and quiet, and that life and property are entirely safe.

The Mexican people like their government. They know that no government that they have ever had has done one-half as much for their prosperity and progress.

They know that the highest amount that was ever spent for schools under former administrations was $9,000,000 a year, while the Obregon administration is spending over $50,000,000 on education, and purposes increasing that amount.

They know that not only schoolboys but all other civilized influences are being developed. They know that the railroads are being extended and improved, and that the great highways are being built from the railroad terminals into distant districts. They know that the telephone systems are being installed between towns, that electric lighting systems are being put even into the smallest towns, that power is being developed, that water systems are being improved for drinking purposes, for irrigation purposes, and for manufacturing purposes.

They know that hospitals are being built and cleanliness and sanitation encouraged. They know that temperance legislation has passed in some States and is pending in others. They know that farm schools and manual training schools are being established to teach the farmers and the workingmen how to make the most and best out of their opportunities.

They know that everything is being done to increase the intelligence, the skill, the productivity, the per capita wealth, the happiness of the individual citizen.

What they do not understand is why the United States, which is supposed to be a progressive and democratic nation, does not recognize a sister Republic which is keeping pace with it in progress and democracy, and in the effort for social betterment.

General Ignacio Enriquez, capable and cultured governor of Chihuahua, distinguished graduate of the University of Illinois, intense patriot, sincere Democrat, and profound thinker, declares that the Mexican revolution sprang from the mind of the United States of America, like Athena from the head of Zeus.

Very many Mexican young men of the upper classes have been educated at American schools and colleges. Many Mexican business men and workingmen in pursuit of their occupations have lived in America for protracted periods.

All these men of all classes have come back to Mexico imbued with American ideas of political freedom, of equality before the law, of opportunity for individual and general betterment, and have desired to engraft those ideas upon the Mexican governmental system.

Thus, says Governor Enriquez, the revolution started in those northern Mexican States which were nearest to the United States and was born of American thought and modeled on American customs.

Why, then, should the United States hesitate to recognize this truly republican Government which is in large measure the child of its own brain, and which seeks but to follow in the path of liberty and enlightenment, of progress and prosperity which the United States itself has trod?

We Americans who have been in Mexico can only echo Governor Enriquez's perplexed inquiry: "Why, indeed?"

WHY IS THE FRIENDLY, ORDERLY, REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT OF MEXICO NOT RECOGNIZED?

[Published January 15, 1922.]

When is the Government of one nation "recognized" by the Governments of other civilized nations?

The answer to this question is very simple, the practice hitherto invariable.

The Government of a nation is recognized, first, when it is representative of the nation it governs, when it holds office by the will and through the act of a sufficient majority of the people.

The Government of a nation is recognized, second, when it demonstrates that it is an efficient Government, maintaining law and order and civilized conditions.

The Government of a nation is recognized, third, when it is a reasonably friendly Government to other nations, extending proper protection to the citizens of other nations in their political and property rights.

The Government of the United States of Mexico conforms to all of these three requirements.

Why, then, is it not recognized by the Government of the United States of America?

The government of Alvaro Obregon has been in office more than a year.

It was elected overwhelmingly. It has been supported almost unanimously.

It is therefore the most representative government that Mexico has had in the life of the present generation.

The government of Alvaro Obregon restored peace in Mexico immediately upon its accession, and installed better order and a more generally approved and respected law, and more just and equitable and beneficial civilized conditions in Mexico than have ever prevailed in the history of the country.

And, finally, the government of Alvaro Obregon is more friendly to the United States of America and the people of the United States than any Government of Mexico has been for many years.

The people of this country are invited into Mexico by the Obregon government.

They are protected while in Mexico by the Obregon government.

They are offered opportunity for investment, and security for their investments; they constitute almost a favored class in the community, in the fact that many laws which are intended to regulate and restrict the property holdings of Mexican citizens do not apply to the citizens of the United States.

The Obregon government is not only friendly to the people of the United States but to the Government of the United States, making our Government its model in many respects and always speaking and acting in the most friendly and generous way toward our Government and toward the individuals who constitute our Government; notwithstanding the fact that Mexico has encountered so little courtesy and consideration—in fact, so great a lack of courtesy and consideration—at the hands of this Government.

There would appear to be then no reason, political or personal, why the Government of Mexico should not be recognized by the Government of the United States.

And as a matter of fact there is no reason, political or personal, but there is said very plainly to be a financial reason.

And the citizens of the United States must discover the truth about this situation, and this financial reason, although the truth may be rather humiliating to learn.

The plain facts, as stated by various informed correspondents of these publications, are that the international bankers contributed very largely to the campaign funds of the Republican Party, and that these international bankers have since been seeking every opportunity to recoup themselves and make a handsome profit in addition, not only at the expense of the reputation of the Republican Party but at the sacrifice of the public welfare of the people of the United States.

Consequently, instead of a patriotic and creditable diplomat going to Mexico to represent this country and negotiate recognition, Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, representative of the international bankers, was sent to Mexico and is declared to have submitted to the Mexican Government the proposition that it secure recognition by redeeming at 120 a vast quantity of Mexican bonds which the international bankers had bought at an average of approximately 40.

In other words, the price of recognition was many million dollars in blood money to be paid the international bankers.

A proposition of this extraordinary, not to say outrageous, kind savors somewhat of blackmail; and it certainly is not an inspiring thing to think of the Government of the United States acting as agent of the international bankers in an attempt to blackmail the Mexican Government out of many million undue and undeserved dollars as the price of recognition, which should be extended Mexico as a matter of right and justice and plain friendship between neighboring Republics.

Perhaps the Government of the United States does not know to what extent it was used by the international bankers.

Perhaps the Government of the United States does not know to what extent disappointed big interests have lately endeavored, unsuccessfully, to foment revolution in Mexico, and to overthrow a righteous and rightful government, whose only crime was that it would not bleed its people to pay blackmail to the international bankers.

If the Government of the United States does not know these discreditable facts, the Hearst publications will proceed to establish them more and more day by day until the Government is convinced of these facts, and proceeds to consider the question of Mexican recognition upon its merits and apart from the selfish schemes of the international bankers and certain big oil interests.

This article is being written not in the interest of the people of Mexico but in the interest of the people of the United States.

The friendship of the people of Mexico is important to the United States in a commercial way and in a civic way.

The good will of a country extending for so many miles along our frontier is of much more vital consequence in a military way than alliances with distant and fundamentally different peoples which can bring us nothing but complications and obligations.

It is time our Government realized to what extent it is being misled by the selfish interests of the international bankers into alien associations which can do us no good and into neighboring enmities which may do us much harm.

It is time our Government paid less attention to the interests and influences of the international bankers and gave more heed to the will and the welfare of the American people.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 13, 1922.

The Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: I am in receipt of your letter of February 8, 1922, requesting to be furnished with a list of the governments alphabetically arranged that have recognized the administration now functioning in Mexico.

In reply I beg to inform you that the department's information, derived entirely from Mexican sources, indicates that the governments of the following countries have extended recognition:

Argentine, Austria, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Germany, Guatemala, Holland, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, Venezuela.

The department can assume no responsibility as to the accuracy of this information, and regrets that it is not in a position to furnish you with the dates requested in your letter.

I am, my dear Senator ASHURST,
Sincerely yours,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I also present senate joint memorial No. 3, passed unanimously by both houses of the State Legislature of Arizona, urging the early passage of the bill known as the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill.

There being no objection, the joint memorial No. 3 was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Senate joint memorial No. 3, fifth Legislature, State of Arizona, first special session. In the State senate.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas it is the opinion and judgment of the Arizona Legislature, in special session convened, that the millions of citizens of this Nation who unselfishly risked their lives in patriotic devotion to the Nation during the great World War have not received the consideration from this Nation due them for their patriotic sacrifices; and

Whereas we deem that some prompt and decisive action should be taken by the Congress of the United States toward not only doing justice to our soldiers but also to impress the world at large that this United States, a Nation whose form of government is voluntary and grants the greatest amount of liberty and freedom to its people, is not ungrateful to each individual who, when the Nation's safety is imperiled or when the peace of the world is at stake, unselfishly offers everything possessed, even life itself, that law and order, liberty and righteousness shall prevail; and

Whereas there are now pending in the Congress of the United States various proposals, commonly denominated "bonus measures," having the end in view of making substantial payments to ex-service men and women in recognition of their service to their country: Now be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona in special session convened, That the Congress of the United States be hereby petitioned to speedily arrive at a just and equitable plan whereby the ex-service men and women taking part in the great World War may receive substantial recognition for their patriotism and services.

In adopting this memorial we do so with the firm belief that a righteous plan can be evolved by which funds can be provided for this purpose through the reduction of unnecessary expenditures of the Government and through the utilization of means of revenue which do not impose a burden upon the people and without the imposition of special taxes for that purpose, and we earnestly memorialize the Congress of the United States toward this end; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Arizona.

Adopted by unanimous vote of senate March 14, 1922.

H. B. WILKINSON,
President of Senate.
ROY N. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted by the house March 15, 1922, by viva voce vote.

P. C. KEEFE,
Speaker of the House.
OSCAR ZAPF,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Filed in the office of the Secretary of the State of Arizona this 20th day of March, A. D. 1922, at 11.50 a. m.

ERNEST R. HALL,
Secretary of State.
By JOHN McK. REDMOND,
Assistant Secretary.

Approved March 20, 1922.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor of Arizona.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I also present and ask to have inserted in the RECORD a copy of senate joint memorial No 4, adopted unanimously by both houses of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, urging early passage of the Towner-Sterling bill, which proposes to create a department of education.

Senate joint memorial No. 4 was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 4, Fifth State Legislature State of Arizona, first special session.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona in special session assembled, respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the world-wide extension of popular government has placed upon the masses of the people responsibilities never borne by their forefathers; and

"Whereas enlightenment and the development of wise leaders can only be brought about by educational process; and

"Whereas it is evident from a consideration of conditions now existing in this country as regards illiteracy and the unsatisfactory assimilation of immigrants that methods of handling these problems now in force are inadequate; and

"Whereas a bill is now pending in the Congress of the United States providing for the acceptance of national responsibility for and aid to public education through the apppropriation of $100,000,000 to the several States and the establishing of a Federal department of education: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate of the first special session of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Arizona (the house of representatives concurring), That we hereby memorialize Congress to enact into law the Towner-Sterling bill, known as the education bill; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this memorial and these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress."

Passed the senate March 18, 1922, by unanimous vote.
Adopted by the house March 18, 1922, by unanimous vote.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT ON RESPECT FOR LAW.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think one of the most important subjects that can possibly engage the attention of the American people is the question of enforcement of law. Lincoln well said, "Let reverence for the law become the political religion of the Nation. Let the old and the young, the grave and the gay sacrifice unceasingly on its altars." If this Republic is to live, it will live through respect for the law. This is a Government of law and order. Either the law must be respected or we shall descend into the weltering chaos of the mob. We shall stand on the rock of law enforcement or be swallowed up in the quicksands of lawlessness.

On the subject of respect for law the President of the United States delivered a very interesting, eloquent, and instructive address last night at the Calvary Baptist Church in this city. I ask unanimous consent that the address of the President be printed in the RECORD in the regular 8-point type.

Mr. NORRIS. May I inquire of the Senator whether that was the address delivered last night at the Baptist Church?

Mr. WILLIS. It was.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator's request. May I ask him whether the outline of the address as it appeared in the morning papers was fair?

Mr. WILLIS. I did not read the newspaper account very fully, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska. I read enough of it to lead me to think the address interesting and important. I called one of the President's secretaries this morning by telephone and asked if I could get a copy of it, and I secured this copy. The newspaper outline I saw was fair.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has an authenticated copy?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes. The copy I am offering was sent to me by one of the secretaries of the President at my request.

There being no objection, the President's address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT TO THE VAUGHN BIBLE CLASS OF THE CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH, FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 24, 1922.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the class, it is a very great pleasure to be associated with you to-night, to utter greetings and commend the great work your class is doing. Frankly, my relationship is one of association rather than participation, because I do not feel myself equal to a discussion of the very great topic which has been hinted as my assignment.

Apart from contact with this unusual organization, I have thought I would like to commend such activities, because your class reveals a pursuit of religious activity of inestimable value and interest, and challenges the too prevalent impression that the pursuit of the Christian religion is always solemn and lacking in the charm which is so desirable in our social life. It is a very simple discovery, but there are far too few discoverers, that the Bible is the most fascinating study in all our literature and the lessons taught are the most helpful which may be brought into our daily lives.

There is no relationship here between church and state. Religious liberty has its unalterable place, along with civil and human liberty, in the very foundation of the Republic. Therein is shown the far-seeing vision of the immortal founders, and we are a better people and a better Republic because there is that freedom.

I fear it is forgotten sometimes. In the experiences of a year in the Presidency there has come to me no other such unwelcome impression as the manifest religious intolerance which exists among many of our citizens. I hold it to be a menace to the very liberties we boast and cherish.

In spite of our complete divorcement of church and state, quite in harmony with our religious freedom, there is an important relationship between church and nation, because no nation can prosper, no nation can survive if it ever forgets Almighty God. I have believed that religious reverence has played a very influential and helpful part in the matchless American achievement, and I wish it ever to abide. If I were to utter a prayer for the Republic to-night, it would be to reconsecrate us in religious devotion and make us abidingly a God-fearing, God-loving people.

I do not fail to recall that the religious life makes for the simple life, and it would be like a divine benediction to restore the simpler life in this Republic.

There is a good deal of loose talk nowadays about the cause of the spiritual demoralization of the community, which it has become popular to attribute to the abnormal conditions that were incident to the war. But, in fact, the war is not wholly to blame. Before the war started, or was dreamed of, we were already realizing the tendency toward a certain moral laxity, a shifting of standards, a weakening of the sterner fibers. I think we should do well to recognize that these tendencies are not a mere momentary incident, but a serious phase in the intellectual and moral evolution of the community. It would be a grievous error to allow ourselves to feel too confident that this is only a temporary and passing aspect.

Take, for example, the matter of regard for the law. Without giving too much weight to alarmist expressions, we must nevertheless recognize that there is a very apparent tendency to a lighter and a more frivolous view of the citizen's relations to both the state and the church. We can hardly hope for a restoration of the old ideals in religion and in moral conduct so long as this tendency to disregard for the law shall continue. It is absolutely essential to the maintenance of a secure society and to the statement of a proper moral plane that the law should be recognized as sacred and supreme. It should have at its back and enlisted in its support every element of the community that realizes the desirability of sound, secure, and stable institutions. Disregard of one statute inevitably must breed a lack of respect for the law in general. This tendency is obvious, and ought to give the deepest concern to people who have seen in this world the fearful results that may flow from the breakdown of respect for the social fundamentals.

Whatever breeds disrespect for the law of the land in any particular department of our community relations is a force tending to the general breakdown of the social organization. If people who are known as leaders, as directing influences, as thoroughly respected and respectable members of society, shall in their respective communities become known for their defiance of some part of the code of law, then they need not be astonished if presently they find that their example is followed by others, with the result that presently the law in general comes to be looked upon as a set of irksome and unreasonable restraints upon the liberty of the individual. Every law involves more or less of this element of restraint. Nearly every individual will find some part of the code that to him seems an unreasonable inhibition upon his personal freedom of action. Our only safety will be in inculcating an attitude of respect for the law as, on the whole, the best expression that has been given to the social aspiration and moral purpose of the community. Unless we can accomplish this in the domain of citizenship, and thereby sustain enforcement, we may well feel that the outlook is not encouraging for the achievement of those loftier spiritual purposes to which the church is devoted. Therefore I can think of no higher service that the church in a time like this may render than to put forth its utmost influence in behalf of frank and willing obedience to the law of the land. Therein, I think, will be found the largest contribution toward guaranty of the Nation's safety, the most promising assurance of ultimate realization of the highest aspirations of the church in behalf of all humanity.

Nations have left their lessons in the pages of history. This Republic is yet youthful enough to learn from the study of these lessons. The failures of the past invariably have been preceded by contempt for the law, by spiritual paralysis, and moral looseness, all of which had their earlier reflex in the weakened influence of the church. We know the helpful, exalting influence of our religious institutions. No one dares to dispute. We shall be made stronger as they become stronger, and we shall ever find greater pride and greater security in the Nation which righteousness exalteth.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, some days ago I called attention of the Senate to a statement by the head of the American Legion in which he said there were 700,000 ex-service men idle. Also I read a letter from the head of the American Federation of Labor protesting against the immigration bill which has passed the House, is now before the Senate Committee on Immigration, and is to come before the Senate. The American Legion officials and also the American Federation of Labor have indorsed the principle.

I have advocated in doing away with all immigration for five years. I introduced a bill to prevent further immigration for five years, and I have an amendment to the House bill pending before the Senate Immigration Committee to prevent immigration for five years. I have here a statement from President Harding's special commissioner, Mrs. Lillian Russell Moore, who has just returned from Europe on an important mission for President Harding. She spent several months in Europe studying the immigration question as it affects our country. She advocates doing away with all immigration for five years, which is in line with the bill that I have presented and the amendment I offered which has been before the committee.

I noticed in the Atlanta Journal a statement of Mr. Henry Ford, who was passing through Atlanta on his way to Florida, with reference to the bonus and unemployment, in which he says he is opposing the bonus. I do not agree with that; but he says if he gets Muscle Shoals he will give preference to ex-service men in the employment of men needed in this development and that he can take care of a large part of the idle ex-service men, will do away with the necessity for the bonus, and also greatly help to do away with the unemployment of this country.

I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD both of the statements to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal.]

Mr. Ford said: "If Congress would give me the right to develop Muscle Shoals, there would be no need of a bonus; I'd provide good, steady jobs for those boys."

The automobile magnate disclosed plans to develop 800,000 horsepower at Muscle Shoals and employ one man for each horsepower if Congress accepts his bid.

"Within 12 hours after Congress told me I could take over Muscle Shoals, I would have thousands of men on the way there to go to work, and preference would be given former soldiers and sailors," he asserted.

Mr. Ford said his fight for Muscle Shoals had hardly begun.

"I know the opposition interests are moving heaven and earth to block the acceptance of my bid, but I am fighting back and intend to keep on fighting until I land the property," he asserted.

"And when I get it," he said, "I'll do the very best I can to develop it fully just as quick as I can."

Mr. Ford said the first thing he would do would be to develop the manufacture of nitrate for the farmers. He said it would be sold to them at the cost of production plus 8 per cent, adding it was his policy "never to ask more than a fair profit for what I produce."

The manufacturer said he wanted possession of the shoals, not for his own benefit but for the benefit of the American people.

CAN DO WITHOUT IT.

"Personally it doesn't matter whether I get it or not," he said. "I can manage, I think, to get along without it; but I do see a great opportunity to render a real service to the people of the country, particularly to the farmers of the Southern States who are so hard hit at this time."

The first development, in the event his bid is accepted, will be the manufacture of nitrate, Mr. Ford said. Then the development of great electrical power and other projects would be pushed forward, he said.

"The first thing I'd like to do would be to pull your southern farmers out of the hole," he said.

Figuring that he would be able to give 800,000 men steady work at the big plant, Mr. Ford declared he believed this figure more than covered the number of ex-service men who are now idle.

"Those boys don't need a small Government bonus that would be an insult and a premium on their patriotism; what they need and want is regular work at good wages, and that's what I'm asking the Government to let me give them," he went on.

ADVOCATES FIVE-YEAR IMMIGRATION BAN—LILLIAN RUSSELL TO REPORT HERE THIS WEEK ON INVESTIGATION IN EUROPE FOR UNITED STATES—SEES FARM LABOR AS NEED—SPECIAL COMMISSIONER, DESCRIBING TRIP, GIVES VIEWS ON METHODS OF EDUCATING ALIENS.

(By Winifred Van Duzer.)

[Special to the Washington Post.]

NEW YORK, March 19.—Lillian Russell, in private life Mrs. Alexander P. Moore, will recommend a law prohibiting all immigration for a period of five years when she reports upon her investigation of immigration problems at Washington next week.

Mrs. Moore, who is the first woman ever to hold such a post, has returned from a three-months tour of Europe as special commissioner of immigration.

FARM WORKERS NEEDED.

To-day she stated that at least five years would be required to straighten out problems incident to the passing on potential citizens by the various consuls abroad and receiving those citizens in this country. She said:

"Europe is ready to release thousands of immigrants, most of them undesirable, the moment our restrictions are lifted. It is for us to stem such a destructive tide by legislation which will admit to residence here only constructive labor. We need farm workers, not lower East Side denizens, which are the sort most eager to enter here.

"From information gathered on my mission I should say that this latter element comes largely from the Slav countries—Russia, Poland, and so on.

RIDE THROUGH ITALY REVELATION.

"The thrifty farm workers are Italians and Hungarians. It was a revelation to ride through Italy. There is not any chance of space there not being cultivated. I saw miles of artichokes and more miles of carnations.

"Such industry is what we need in the United States. By supplying this country with farm workers we would cut down the inordinately high prices of foods by the very simple method of supplying people to cultivate the earth which now lies worthless for want of care."

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a signed editorial by William Randolph Hearst on the merchant marine situation. It is so clear and concise and states so forcibly the problem which confronts us that I think it would be well to have it inserted in the RECORD. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times, Sunday, March 19, 1922.]

PEOPLE URGED TO BACK HARDING'S PLAN FOR BIG MERCHANT MARINE.

President Harding has proposed a plan of creating an adequate American merchant marine by measures providing for ship subsidies.

There is no question of the necessity for developing an American merchant marine at least equal to the merchant marine of any other country.

America has assumed the leadership of the world in industry, and the desirability of possessing an American merchant marine to distribute American products through the world and to develop to the utmost new markets for them is apparent to everyone.

A new and vital need for an American merchant marine, however, has arisen with the proposed new treaties of alliance and agreements to limit naval construction.

The theory of these agreements is that the United States should be allowed a Navy equal to that of Great Britain. But the actual sea power of Great Britain, the actual naval force available in time of war, is the navy of Great Britain plus the convertible merchant marine.

In fact, it is easily conceivable that the actual battleships of Great Britain might not in time of war equal in importance the immense convertible merchant marine which Great Britain has developed and is always further developing.

Certainly the actual naval vessels of Great Britain plus her convertible merchant marine—her auxiliary navy—give her a sea power double that of the United States under present conditions.

And when we add to this the sea power of Great Britain's ally, Japan, which consists of a formidable navy plus a formidable convertible merchant marine, we see how dangerously inferior the United States is with a naval defense limited to its purely naval vessels.

To express the situation in figures similar to those which have been used in the international naval agreement, let us place the actual British naval strength at five plus a convertible merchant marine equaling another five.

Let us then place the Japanese navy at the figure three, plus a convertible merchant marine equaling another three.

The total of these units of sea power would then sum up 10 for Great Britain, 6 for Japan, and 16 for the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

To oppose this combination, or even to oppose one of these nations individually, the United States has an actual naval force equal to five units, and a convertible merchant marine barely equal to one unit.

So that under present conditions the fighting force of the United States—naval power plus merchant ships convertible into an auxiliary navy—is practically no greater than that of Japan, not much more than half that of England, and only a little more than a third that of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

The importance of a merchant marine, therefore, for the United States now becomes much more than commercial.

It is a vital matter of adequate naval defense.

The proportion of naval defense patronizingly permitted to the United States by Great Britain is wholly inadequate in the face of the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

But it becomes fearfully insufficient in the absence of a convertible merchant marine at least equal to that of Great Britain. The question, therefore, before the country is not whether we should have an adequate merchant marine. All patriotic citizens, Democratic or Republican, must agree on that point.

The only question is how such a merchant marine can be secured in the best manner and in the quickest manner.

There are three available methods: One may be called the Democratic method, by means of preferential duties; another may be called the progressive method, through public ownership and operation; the third is what we might call the conservative method, through subsidies.

It may be urged more or less convincingly by Democrats that the method of preferential duties is the best, and that it has demonstrated its value by the actual creation of an American merchant marine in the past which flaunted the American flag on every sea and challenged in every quarter of the globe the supremacy of Great Britain on the seas which she is supposed to rule.

It may be logically argued by the progressive thinkers of the community that Government ownership and operation of a merchant marine is the method most in line with modern thought and modern economic and political development.

It may also be argued with equal logic by conservatives that the ship subsidy method of developing an American merchant marine is the surest, because it is the method employed by the nations which actually possess the greatest merchant marines, such as England and Japan.

The question, however, is not so much a theoretical one as it is a practical one, and resolves itself into the plain proposition as to which of the three methods can be employed most immediately and most effectively.

The present Republican national administration—the only power to which the people can look for help in this emergency—has pronounced in favor of the ship subsidy as the best means of creating the required American merchant marine.

The Hearst papers have never been in favor of a ship subsidy, but they will support the proposal of President Harding on the purely patriotic grounds that it is better to have a merchant marine created by a ship subsidy than not to have a merchant marine at all. And obviously there is no immediate prospect of securing a merchant marine by any other means.

Moreover, with a merchant marine once thoroughly established and efficiently operated, there will be no reason why some progressive administration in the future may not take over this established merchant marine and operate it under Government ownership—if the people of the United States at that time shall feel convinced that Government ownership is the best method of operating a merchant marine in the interests of the whole Nation.

The Hearst papers call upon their readers, of whatever political faith, to support President Harding in his patriotic demand for an American merchant marine, and not to deliberate too long or to debate too much over the particular method by which this merchant marine is to be secured.

Preferential duties can always be added to our policy at a later date if desirable.

Ultimate Government ownership, as stated above, can be looked forward to by those who are committed to that method.

But the immediate opportunity under the present administration is a merchant marine through ship subsidy.

And the requirement of a merchant marine is so immediate, the necessity so pressing, that the quickest way is the best way in the opinion of these newspapers.

There is, moreover, much to be said in illustration of the demonstrated success of ship subsidies in developing the British merchant marine.

And there is likewise much to be said by argument derived from proved practice and experience in encouraging the railroads to develop their carrying facilities by steamship lines operated in connection with the railroads.

This much has been demonstrated by the British Empire in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and these newspapers advise the people of the United States and the Government of the United States to put into immediate practice in the creation of a merchant marine all that Great Britain has proved to be practical and beneficial, and then to add to these plans and policies whatever the enterprise and ingenuity and resourcefulness of the people of the United States shall devise in the future to increase the advantage of these plans and policies.

Let us, therefore, good citizens, stand back of our President in his demand for an American merchant marine, and agree with him, for the present at least, upon the policies which he considers best suited to its immediate creation.

Thus we will, without selfishness and without prejudice, do our patriotic duty as we see it.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

WRANGEL ISLAND.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a brief letter from W. E. Reynolds, captain commandant of the United States Coast Guard, furnishing interesting information in connection with the issue which seems to have arisen between this Government and Great Britain respecting Wrangel Island.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES COAST GUARD,
Washington, March 23, 1922.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am much interested in your remarks concerning Wrangel Island which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday on pages 4260 and 4261. I was a junior officer on the revenue cutter Corwin in 1881, when she made the cruise in the Arctic Ocean in search of the Jeannette relief expedition. I was in the boat that landed on Wrangel Island on August 12, 1881, which was the first-known landing on that island. In addition to the boat's crew there were in the boat the commanding officer of the Corwin, Capt. C. L. Hooper; Dr. Irving Ross, the ship's surgeon; Fred E. Owen, an engineer officer; Prof. John Muir and Mr. Nelson, who were passengers, and myself. The captain and I landed together, being the first to get ashore. I had the flag, and with the captain's permission waved it and took possession of the new land in the name of liberty and of the Government of the United States of America. I planted the flag on a bluff a little to the northward of our landing place, and left it there, together with a record of our visit. The place was subsequently visited by the U. S. S. Rogers, which was also in search of the Jeannette.

Very sincerely yours,

W. E. REYNOLDS,
Captain Commandant, United States Coast Guard.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a memorial of the Legislature of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
STATE OF FLORIDA,
Tallahassee, March 7, 1922.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am inclosing certified copy of house memorial No. 8 as passed by the Florida Legislature of 1921 and filed in this office.

Yours very truly,

H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill known as the soldiers and sailors' adjusted compensation act; and

Whereas said bill is sponsored by the American Legion of the United States; and

Whereas said bill is also known as the American Legion's fourfold plan for a bonus; and

Whereas the American Legion of the State of Florida, at its convention held at Orlando, Fla., May 16 and 17, 1921, has requested the Legislature of the State of Florida to memorialize Congress in aid of said bill: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Florida in Legislature assembled (the Senate concurring), That the Florida Representatives in the Congress of the United States—Hon. D. U. FLETCHER, Hon. PARK TRAMMELL, Hon. FRANK CLARK, Hon. H. J. DRANE, Hon. J. H. SMITHWICK, and Hon. JOE SEARS—be, and they are hereby, requested to inform the Congress of the United States that the people of the State of Florida are interested in the passage of the bill now before Congress, commonly known as the American Legion's fourfold adjusted compensation bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the Florida Representatives in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested to use their every effort in securing the early passage of said bill through the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Florida be, and he is hereby, directed to send a copy of this memorial, under the great seal of the State of Florida, to the Congress of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Florida in Congress assembled.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, H. Clay Crawford, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of house memorial No. 8 as passed by the Florida Legislature of 1921 and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 6th day of March, A. D. 1922.

[SEAL.] H. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution of Glenwood Lodge, No. 520, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen of America, of Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the passage of the so-called Dyer anti-lynching bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Urichsville Board of Trade, of Urichsville, Ohio, favoring enforcement of the laws against the liquor traffic, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Little Rock, Ark., remonstrating against the reduction of the enlisted personnel of the Navy below the numbers recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Junior Order United American Mechanics of Sebastian County, Ark., favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution of the Senate of the State of Arizona favoring the full recognition of the President and Government of Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Arizona praying for the passage of legislation granting substantial recognition to ex-service men and women of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Arizona favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

[See resolutions in full previously presented by Mr. ASHURST.]

He also presented resolutions adopted by Stephen D. Little Garrison, No. 125, Army and Navy Union, of Nogales, Ariz., favoring the enactment of beneficial legislation for veterans of all wars, the imposition of an excess-profits tax rather than a sales tax for raising the necessary funds therefor, and the passage of the so-called Morgan bill, increasing the pensions of Civil War veterans and their widows, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SIMMONS presented a memorial of the Minneapolis (Minn.) Republican Club, remonstrating against the ratification of the four-power treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Reserve Officers' Association of Western North Carolina, of Asheville, N. C., favoring the maintenance of a Regular Army of at least 125,000 men and 12,000 officers, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Reserve Officers' Association of Western North Carolina, of Asheville, N. C., remonstrating against the proposed reduction of 50 per cent in the steaming coal allowance of the Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution of the Central Labor Union of Charlotte, N. C., favoring an investigation of the cotton industry in the New England States, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

FISH-RESCUE STATION ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. LENROOT, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2393) to provide for the establishment on the Mississippi River of a fish-rescue station, to be under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 576) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on March 25, 1922, they presented to the President of the United States enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3209. An act granting to the Northern Pacific Railway Co. the right to construct and maintain a bridge across the Mississippi River at Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota; and

S. 3265. An act construing the expression "all employees in the classified civil service of the United States," as used in section 1 of the act of May 22, 1920, entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes."

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill (S. 3279) to provide for the payment of one-half the cost of the construction of a bridge across the San Juan River, N. Mex., was referred to the Committee on Commerce. This is a bill, I understand, that provides for the building of a bridge across a nonnavigable stream connected with an Indian reservation, and it should go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3335) to authorize the acceptance of title to forest lands in the State of Florida and to create national forests therefrom, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3336) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Bills; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 3337) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to state for the benefit of Senators in just a word what this bill is, because undoubtedly there will be inquiries with regard to it. It is a verbatim copy of the cold storage bill as it passed the Senate in the last Congress. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate at a recent meeting thought the bill ought to be reintroduced in this form. There is no change from the bill as it passed the Senate at that time, and, as Senators know, it failed to become a law by reason of disagreement in conference.

By Mr. EDGE (for Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN):

A bill (S. 3338) for the relief of Joseph A. Frayne; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3339) for the relief of the children of Stephen Dickerson; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3340) granting a pension to Barney McKay; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 3341) to abolish capital punishment in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 182) making available certain appropriations for registers and receivers at the land offices at Fort Sumner, Clayton, and Tucumcari, N. Mex.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

SUPPLEMENTARY FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is Executive O, the four-power supplementary agreement.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the agreement submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions, and defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan.

Mr. ROBINSON. I offer the following amendment to the treaty. In the second paragraph I move to strike out the words "Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin)."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed in the second paragraph, after the word "only," to strike out the words "Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin)," so that if amended the paragraph will read:

> The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Formosa and the Pescadores and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend at the present time to address myself directly to this amendment. However, I intend to call attention to the opportunity to remedy, in action on this treaty, some of the omissions, as it occurs to me, on the ratification of the treaty upon yesterday, the four-power treaty.

In the four-power treaty as it was presented to the Senate was a reservation, placed there by the signers of the treaty. That reservation has been eliminated from the treaty. It has ceased to exit. I am frank to confess that I do not understand by what authority or action it was eliminated from the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, it never was in the treaty at any time and never has been eliminated. It stands, just as it always stood, as a declaration of the signatories.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly what I am trying to ascertain. That is what the Senator said upon yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. And that is the fact.

Mr. PITTMAN. But I have in my hand here the four-power treaty as presented to the Senate, and I find the statement in it as presented. I find that statement signed by all the signatory powers to the treaty. It was signed with exactly the same formality as the main body of the treaty was signed. It reads as follows:

> In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers:
> 1. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.
> 2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.
> WASHINGTON, D. C., December 13, 1921.

It is signed by Charles Evans Hughes and the other signatories to the treaty.

Mr. President, a treaty is nothing on earth except a contract between nations, and everything that is in the writing signed by the parties to the contract must be taken into consideration as bearing upon the agreement. The signatories could not make an agreement. The main body of this four-power pact was no more a contract before it was ratified by two-thirds of the United States Senate than was this addendum to the contract which was not ratified by the United States Senate. They both came before this body as simply a preliminary contract negotiated by the parties who signed it. It was the duty of the President to present that contract as negotiated for the consideration of this body. In my opinion, either the President of the United States did not perform his constitutional duty or those in this Chamber who were representing him did not perform theirs. Only a portion of this treaty was presented to the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that it constituted merely an explanation on the part of the makers of the treaty. The whole body of the instrument is only the explanation of the makers of the treaty. The language in the four articles is solely for the purpose of trying to convey what the agreement was; but the makers of this treaty found it was necessary to place an addendum to the four articles to explain what they meant in the four articles, and that explanation becomes just as much a part of the written contract as if it were article 5. There would have been no distinction if it had been article 5. It had just the same relation to the treaty as negotiated as the so-called Brandegee amendment now has to the treaty as ratified. The Brandegee reservation becomes a part of the treaty; I do not think there is any question about that. It would certainly be useless if it did not become a part of the treaty, if it did not become a part of the contract.

Mr. President, I remember very distinctly that when the Versailles treaty was under consideration there were Senators who proposed that, instead of adopting reservations to the treaty itself, we should pass a separate resolution declaring our interpretation of the treaty. It was then argued, and argued forcefully, that a separate resolution would not become a part of the contract; that other powers would not have to consider that separate resolution, would not have to read it, and would not be bound by it in any way.

However, it may be argued possibly that the other three countries can not go back upon the declaration made by the executors of the treaty, even though it has not been adopted as a part of the treaty, because it is the commitment of those who wrote it. Mind you, Mr. President, if the drafters of the treaty had the legal authority under our Constitution to make the contract without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, then it would be binding upon this Government and upon other powers; but certainly it can not be held that this declaration of the signatory powers which has now been eliminated is binding upon the United States, because it was presented to the United States Senate, whose concurrence is essential to making a contract on the part of this Government, and the United States Senate expressly refused to ratify it. We could not assume that the United States has given silent consent to the interpretation placed upon it by the signers, because it came to the notice of the United States Senate in being presented to them, and the United States Senate declined to approve it by a vote of this body, as it did approve the four articles of the four-power pact.

But, nevertheless, the fact remains, Mr. President, that the Senate of the United States has gone further in denying the authenticity of this reservation, because the second paragraph of the reservation, which was eliminated by the Senate, provides—

> 2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

That was undoubtedly considered of importance to the United States in the adoption of the treaty. The matter was called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] on yesterday. He then said:

> I would like to ask the Chair whether the resolution of ratification as read will, if adopted by the constitutional majority, apply to the following language of the treaty:
> "In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers:
> "1. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.
> "2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers."
>
> The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that that is the declaration of the signatory powers and not a part of the treaty.

Later on the Senator from Nebraska said:

> And it is printed with the treaty in advance of the resolution of ratification.
> Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, all this debate is out of order, but the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska was not reported as a part of the treaty, and is not a part of the treaty. It is merely a declaration of the understanding and intent of the signatories of the treaty.
> Mr. HITCHCOCK. I assume that the Senate has the right to pass upon the position of the United States as well as those who negotiated the treaty. Can they bind the Senate without the matter having even been read to the Senate?
> Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that this debate is out of order.

So, Mr. President, that safeguard with regard to our domestic relations, although, as is contended, it was not referred to this body, was considered vital by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, not only in the making of this treaty but in connection with the ratification of the Versailles treaty. He thought it was vital; in fact, so vital that he had it incorporated in the four-power pact as an addendum, signed by all the parties to be bound by it; and yet when it came to this body he states that it is not a part of the treaty; that it is only an expression on the part of the individuals who drafted the treaty. Therefore, so far as the four-power treaty is concerned, this addendum, whether or not it was merely an individual expression at the time it was written, is now nothing, because it has gone out of existence, never having been read nor acted upon in accordance with the rules of the Senate. It is now too late, because the rest of the treaty has been ratified and returned to the President.

Mr. President, on yesterday I offered a reservation intended to protect our domestic questions against consideration or adjustment by the four signatory powers. The reservation offered by me was in identical language, except as to the last three or four lines, with the reservation presented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts as an amendment to the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty. I will not read it because Senators are familiar with it, but, with the permission of the Senate, will place it in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reservation referred to is as follows:

And that the United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way for consideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. I feel that at this point I should defend the Senator from Massachusetts to a certain extent, because I notice that one of the morning papers, in commenting upon the proceedings of yesterday, stated that the resolution was so involved that portions of it being heard provoked merriment in the galleries. It is possible that it is involved, and yet I had such confidence in the ability of the Senator from Massachusetts to draft reservations and the reservation presented by him to the Versailles treaty having been approved by a majority vote of the Senate at the time of consideration of that treaty, that I adopted the exact language which was approved by the Senator from Massachusetts and by the majority of this body in connection with the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty. I ask consent at the end of my remarks to place in the RECORD the entire resolution of ratification to the Versailles treaty as finally adopted by a majority of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. It will be found that the resolution which I offered yesterday designed to protect the United States against interference in its domestic affairs by the four powers at any conference which may be called was taken word for word from reservation No. 4 to the Versailles treaty. Let me call attention to the fact that every Senator, except four, who voted for that reservation to the Versailles treaty voted upon yesterday against the similar reservation to the four-power pact.

Mr. President, it is hardly worth while to call attention to the materiality of a provision of that kind in any treaty that may be so construed as to involve questions affecting our domestic relations. As I have said before, the drafters of this treaty saw the necessity of it, and they provided for it, and then for some reason they determined that they would take it out of the treaty, which they did effectually by not permitting it even to be read to the Senate.

I have read what purports to be a statement by the British ambassador at a public meeting with regard to threats of war in the Pacific that endangered the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is only fair to say that he absolutely and flatly denied that he made that statement.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is more accurate in discussing historical matters than he is in discussing newspaper reports, or matters of less importance. As a matter of fact, I will place in the RECORD later with the consent of the Senate what the British Ambassador said. He denied categorically that he said that war was imminent. He admitted that what he did say, however, was what had been said a number of times throughout the country. That was his denial. His denial was a negative pregnant. He denied using the exact language—that is all. It is a common form of denial when you can not make any other kind of denial; but in that very denial he authorized it to be said that what he did say was what was said publicly all through this country with regard to the threat of war in the Pacific. So he did say something with regard to the threat of war in the Pacific, and the Senator from Massachusetts will not deny that he admitted that.

What did he say with regard to the threat of war in the Pacific? Possibly the Senator from Massachusetts knows. Did he say that the United States was threatened by that war? Did he say that the United States was relieved from that threat by virtue of the four-power pact? That was the whole object of his speech—to disclose that the United States was now removed from that fear by the four-power pact.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. In that connection, I will say to the Senator from Nevada that Mr. Nevinson, before he left for England, stated that we had avoided war with England by deciding to reduce the size of our fleet. He said that if we had continued to build our fleet, war with Great Britain would have been inevitable; so that that statement would seem to support the views of the other distinguished Britisher.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Nevinson, connected with the Manchester Guardian, to whom the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] has referred, not only stated that by agreeing to reduce our fleet we had escaped war with Great Britain, but he said that war inevitably would have occurred within the next five years if we had not pursued the course we did pursue in agreeing to certain of the treaties proposed by the Washington conference. That statement was published in the Outlook. I myself referred to it some days ago during the debate on the four-power treaty.

Mr. FRANCE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not raising this question for the purpose of prefacing an attack on the British ambassador, and I hope that will not be the effect of it. What I am getting at is this: The British ambassador was making a speech of assurance to western people. It was a comforting speech. He was assuring them that the dangers of war that had been hanging over them in the Pacific were now forever removed by the four-power pact.

There is no doubt about that. Whether he said that the war was imminent or not is immaterial to me. He spoke with regard to war and threats of war, and threats of war must be somewhat proximate, or there would not be much fear with regard to them. But here is the question: The ambassador must have had in mind the cause or the causes of those threats of war. What were they? Was there ever any unpleasant feeling between Japan and the United States by reason of any aggression or threatened aggression on the part of the United States against any of the possessions of Japan? Never. There never has been an intimation that the United States Government ever coveted a foot of land possessed by Japan or even claimed by Japan. What was, then, the cause of this unfriendly feeling between the United States and Japan? Did it involve anything the United States was doing or threatened to do in the Far East? If so, I never have heard of it. Did it originate by reason of any act or threatened act upon the part of the United States with regard to the policy of Japan in the Far East? If so, I never have heard of it.

Mr. President, the British ambassador knew, and we knew, and we know now, the cause of the unfriendly feeling, if any exists, between the Japanese people and the people of the United States. It is with regard to our own conduct of our domestic affairs; that is all. It is because it is claimed that we have injured the dignity and pride of the Japanese race by not treating them as we treat other nations within our own borders. That is the cause of the unfriendly feeling. It is because California and Texas and other States have passed laws prohibiting Japanese subjects from acquiring real property—land—in those States. That is the reason of it. It is because we deny them the right of becoming citizens of the United States. Those are the reasons of it, and those are the only reasons that have ever caused any unfriendly feeling between the Japanese people and the people of the United States. Those are the only causes that have threatened war with the United States, and the British ambassador knew it.

How is the four-power pact to relieve that condition? And yet the British ambassador says that the four-power pact does relieve that threat of war. As long as the United States or any of its States prohibit Japanese subjects from becoming citizens of the United States, the same as the subjects of Great Britain and France and other countries, there will be that bitter feeling against the United States. So long as the States of this Union pass laws prejudicial to the subjects of Japan in comparison with the subjects of other States, that hard feeling will exist. Those threats of war will continue as long as that feeling exists. How does the four-power pact remedy that situation?

I can see how the four-power pact would relieve Japan from any fear of aggression on our part against her islands, but Japan has never had that fear, because there never has been a threat of that kind on the part of the United States; but how can this pact relieve Japanese feelings with regard to our discrimination against her subjects within our borders, unless—mind you—unless those questions are to be referred to these four powers?

Is it the intention of the Senate of the United States that should there arise a threat of war between the United States and Japan by reason of our exclusion of Japanese subjects from becoming citizens of the United States the question will be taken up in conference by the four powers? If that is not the intention, then the four-power pact does not in any way tend to relieve the threat of war that has existed, if it ever did exist, between Japan and the United States. Is it the intention of the Senate that in the event of a threat of war between Japan and the United States by reason of the prohibition by certain States of Japanese subjects obtaining land that such cause of controversy will be referred to these four powers? Then, if that is not the intention and that is not the plan the four-power pact has nothing to do with the causes that bring about hard feelings between the United States and Japan and the causes that threaten war, if there are any threats of war; and the British ambassador said that there were threats of war, and that the four-power pact had forever removed that danger of war as far as the United States is concerned. I say to him that if he is right in that, then he must have had in mind that it is the intention of the four powers to take under consideration and settlement the very questions that are threatening war, and those are domestic questions; and yet the proponents of this treaty have deliberately refused to have read in this body and voted upon a part of the treaty, signed by the same people who executed the main body of it, which expressly states that the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Mr. President, if those having charge of this treaty had said, "Let that be read; let that be considered as a part of this treaty," then at least there would have been some protection against an attempted consideration of these domestic questions by those four powers; but they did not do it. They would not let it be read under the rules of the Senate; and yet it was sent to us by the President of the United States as a part of the treaty, signed by the same parties, and not only signed by the same parties but followed by the resolution of ratification.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I correctly understood the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday, he stated that this was a mere supplementary declaration issued by the signers of the four-power treaty, and that it was no part of the treaty itself. Nevertheless, in the first clause of the declaration the following language is used:

> In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan, it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers—

And so forth. Then follow the two declarations in the nature of reservations to which the Senator from Nevada has been referring. So that at the time of the signing of that declaration it was manifestly the expectation of the signers that it should be regarded as a part of the treaty, for they undertook to speak for the signatory powers. Of course, we all understand that Mr. Hughes, and Mr. LODGE, and Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. Root can not bind the United States to an international understanding that is not advised and consented to by the Senate of the United States. Clearly it was the purpose at that time to treat it as a part of the treaty itself.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, when we were considering the covenant under the Versailles treaty there was a contention made on the other side, and a very strong contention, that we might be required to submit to consideration of the League of Nations questions involving some of our domestic relations. A clause of article 15 of the covenant of the League of Nations provided:

> If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council, to arise out of a matter which by international law—

"Which by international law," mind you, the same language as in the reservation referred to in the four-power treaty—> is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

They were not satisfied with that. That exclusion of our domestic relations was not considered sufficiently definite. At that time the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was thinking more of the protection of our domestic affairs than he was of our foreign relations, and in that he is not subject to criticism. But a great change has come over him. For a brief moment, possibly, when they were drafting this four-power treaty, he thought of the domestic affairs of this country and drafted a reservation to the treaty which became a part of the execution of the treaty, because it says so. Then, apparently for some reason, having more assurance, possibly, than he did when he drew it, and maybe because some objections were made by some of the other countries—he has not told us what the reason was—he changed his position, because he would not permit such reservation to be read to the Senate or acted on by this body. Now he says that it is not a part of the treaty, it is not a part of the contract at all; that it is simply an expression of the individuals who drew it. Yet when we had the Versailles treaty under consideration the Senator would not accept the language I have read, declaring that questions determined to be domestic under international law should not be considered by the council of the League of Nations. As I said before, when considering the covenant of the league, he realized that it was so important to keep our domestic affairs to ourselves, that he assisted in the preparation of, and he presented to this body the reservation I am about to read, and this reservation was adopted by a majority vote of this body as a part of the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty. I am reading from reservation 4:

> The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

Yet the Senator from Massachusetts himself, by main force and the power of his position, prevents a reservation of similar import, which the framers of this treaty had in the treaty, from being read or considered by this body, and absolutely wipes it out of existence. Having done that, he refuses to permit the same reservation to this four-power pact which he himself presented and had adopted to the Versailles treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator admit that under the Versailles treaty in case of a dispute between the United States and another member of the league it would be referred to a body where the United States would have no vote and no voice?

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator mean now?

Mr. LENROOT. No; under the Versailles treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator means to say that the United States could not participate in the consideration of a question affecting itself, I reply that undoubtedly it could not.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the four-power treaty when any question is referred to the conference the United States would participate, and no action could be had without the consent of the United States; but that was not true under the Versailles treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I read just now the paragraph referring to domestic questions, and it covered domestic questions, those recognized as domestic questions under international law.

Mr. LENROOT. But the point is that under the Versailles treaty we would have no voice or participation in the determination of the question, and, therefore, if it were submitted they could bind us, while under the four-power pact we participate in the consideration of every question which comes before the conference, and we can not be bound unless we agree to be bound.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the distinguished leader of the majority in drafting this treaty referred to questions which, according to the principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers. There would have been upon the council of the League of Nations, Great Britain, one of these four powers; Japan, another one of these four powers; France, another one of these four powers; Italy, Brazil, and Belgium. Does the Senator mean to say that these people with whom we are willing to contract for 10 long years, by this instrument, would not have decided the principles of international law according to law?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin takes the position that he would not submit to any international conference the power to decide these questions where the United States did not participate. Under the four-power pact the United States does participate and can not be bound without its consent. The Senator must know that.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is absolutely right in his statement. He says he would never submit a domestic question to consideration. Undoubtedly he would not. Why does he not agree that we shall so provide in this instrument? Yesterday he voted against saying that. That shows the distinction. That is the mysterious thing about all this.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Wisconsin is willing to say it in the Senate, but not willing to say it in the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is yet a chance, possibly, in the consideration of this addendum to the treaty to do something consistent with past performances. There is an opportunity still to show some interest in the domestic affairs of this country.

I remember that when the Versailles treaty was up there was even a question as to whether the language meant that it was necessary to have a unanimous vote, and every effort was made to cover that question in the resolution of ratification and by the reservations. Yet in this case there is not a single statement in the treaty that a unanimous vote is required to reach an adjustment.

The Senator from Wisconsin says:

> Well, but in this one it requires our consent. A majority of them can not decide against us. We can stop it.

Yet on yesterday he voted against the reservation which expressly stated that we should not be bound by any adjustment arrived at without our consent. What was the harm in that, if it means the thing he says it means? Why does he want to leave it doubtful and ambiguous? When he was trying to protect his country against the Versailles treaty there was not a safeguard he could think of that he was not willing to throw around it, and yet to-day he is not willing to have added to this treaty a safeguard which means the same he says it means, but which others doubt.

The other day the Senator said:

> Why place in this treaty a declaration which the nations would obviously carry out? Why require these four powers to invite in an outside power with whom they were having a controversy which threatened war? They would naturally do that.

That is what he said. Let me ask him this question: If a controversy arose between some of the four powers, would they not naturally call a conference to discuss it? The four powers did not think it would naturally follow, so in article 1 they absolutely provided it.

Mr. LENROOT. It so happens that the Senator from Wisconsin never made any such statement as the Senator from Nevada is now referring to.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] did. I am told I was mistaken. The Senator from Wisconsin did not say so, but I will ask the Senator now whether he believed that in the event of a controversy between one of the four powers and an outside power threatening war the outside power would be invited into the conference?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin stated that his position is, that in such a contingency the United States can suggest to the other powers that the outside power be invited in, and if they refuse, all obligation upon the part of the United States to attempt to come to an understanding is fulfilled.

Mr. PITTMAN. But that exact expression, or one nearly to that effect, was yesterday offered in the form of a reservation, that if the suggestion of the United States was not agreed to the United States be allowed to withdraw, and the Senator from Wisconsin voted against it. I was mistaken in saying that he made the statement I referred to. It was the Senator from New Jersey, as has been called to my attention. He said that these four powers being humane powers, working for peace, they would naturally invite an outside power in with whom they were having a controversy to discuss that controversy. The Senator from Wisconsin denied that he said it. I do not know whether to take that to mean he does not believe it or not; but if he has any respect for these four powers, he must believe that they would do what was humane and peaceful. He must, then, think that the Senator from New Jersey was right when he said that they would do the natural thing, invite the outside power in; but whether he thinks that or not, the situation is this: That these four powers, in framing this treaty, were not willing to trust each other to that extent. They expressly provided that in the event of a controversy between any of the four powers they would confer with regard to that controversy.

Why was that necessary? It was necessary because those four powers did not want any misunderstanding about it. It is equally necessary that there should be no misunderstanding with regard to a conference with regard to any controversy between any of these four powers and an outside power at which the outside power may be present. Yet the Senator from Wisconsin voted for article 1, which requires the consideration of internal controversies, and voted against the reservation which requires consideration of external controversies.

Now, here is our treaty, and I ask leave to attach as addenda to what I am saying such four-power pact as it was finally ratified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want this in form so that any intelligent person may read the treaty and then read the reservations that were offered to the resolution of ratification and see whether or not in their opinion they do not believe that the reservations should have become a part of the treaty.

Here is one of the first reservations offered. It was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as an amendment to the reservation, and reads:

> If any nation shall refuse to concur in any understanding, it shall in no respect be bound by the understanding arrived at by all or any of the other parties.

Yet that reservation was voted against by all except four of the Republicans. They are willing to take a chance whether any of these powers can withdraw from the conference. Why take a chance? Why be satisfied by saying we know it means that anyway, when you can protect your own people so easily by adopting that very reservation? Is there any excuse for it? You objected to this in the form of amendment. You said the amendment changes the treaty, but when it was asked to have that provision made a part of the Brandegee reservation you were equally opposed to it and voted it down.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] wanted to carry out the expressed thought of this body. He wanted to carry out the sentiments of the people of the country and wanted to include in article 2 the word "pacific." What happened? Here is the way it would have read with the amendment that he offered:

> If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient pacific measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

The only change that he asked to make in article 2 was to put the word "pacific" ahead of the word "measures." That was so there could be no misunderstanding that the people of this country do not favor agreeing on war measures against an outside party. You voted it down. Why? What is the objection to it? The Brandegee reservation had to be considered by the other powers. It would take no longer to consider the word "pacific." There can be only one interpretation of it, and that is that you did not want "pacific" measures. There can be only one interpretation of it, and that is that "pacific" measures would not do—that the only way you could meet outside aggression would be with force, with war. Yet having placed that interpretation upon it you will not stand for any kind of reservation that will bring about a conference with those outside parties before it reaches a stage of aggression and war.

A reservation was offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] providing the machinery for a conference to settle the controversy with outside parties before it reached the stage of war, and you voted it down. I shall not read that reservation. With the consent of the Senate, I will place that in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> And that in case any controversy shall arise between any of the high contracting parties and any other power, involving the rights of any of the said powers in relation to their insular possessions or dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean, not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and likely to lead to war, a conference such as is provided for in article 1 of said treaty shall be called by the parties thereto to which all nations interested in said controversy shall be invited for the consideration and adjustment of such controversy.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] offered an amendment to the Brandegee reservation carrying the same principle, but in different form, in the hope that it might appeal to Senators on the other side, and that was defeated by a unanimous Republican vote, with the exception of four. I ask permission to place that in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The United States understands that each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all other nations and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers. If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord subsisting between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers claiming an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Following these two reservations I offered a reservation which was more limited than the other two in scope in the hope that it might find supporters on the other side. In that reservation I limited it to powers having possessions in the Pacific. Not only that, but I stated that it was understood that the United States Government, not the other powers, but the United States Government alone, ratified the treaty with the understanding that it should have the right to invite such outside powers into conference with the four powers in the event of controversy with such outside powers that threatened war. Yet they voted that down. They denied to our Government individually itself the right to invite an outside nation with whom war was threatened into conference with the four powers. They could not contend we were trying to force Japan, Great Britain, or France to do the inviting. It was a privilege that we had a right to reserve to ourselves, yet all except four Republicans voted against it.

My reservation was as follows:

And that if there should develop between any of the high contracting parties or any other power or powers having possessions in the region of the Pacific a controversy arising out of any Pacific question involving said insular rights and possessions threatening war, which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, the United States shall have the right to invite said other power or powers to a joint conference with the four powers, to which the whole subject shall be referred for consideration.

What was the matter with the reservation which was offered as an amendment to the Brandegee reservation providing that none of the four powers should enter into a separate peace with some other power which was in conflict with the four-power pact and which was destructive or injurious to our rights under that pact? What was wrong with that? Is it possible that we are going to encourage such agreements between the four powers? These things have taken place. We deliberately encourage it by refusing to condemn it. That amendment to the Brandegee reservation I will place in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Provided, That the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the said treaty with the understanding, to be made part of such ratification, that none of the high contracting parties shall, during the life of such treaty, without consulting the other parties, enter into any separate arrangement or understanding with another power, whether one of the high contracting parties or not, with reference either to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean or to the Asiatic mainland, which shall in any way prejudice the objects and rights of the said parties under this treaty or which shall be inconsistent with the terms thereof.

Mr. PITTMAN. Here is another one. Why, it has been contended time and time again that we had to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance so we could protect the Philippine Islands; that the Philippine Islands were threatened by that alliance. Of course, the absurdity of that is known to every intelligent student of history. We know that Great Britain never would join with Japan in a war of aggression against the Philippine Islands, never as long as we are the sponsors for the Philippine Islands. Certainly no one in the United States is afraid of Japan alone attempting to take anything of ours.

But a reservation was offered yesterday which we should have adopted in all honor, which was an obligation upon us to the Philippine people. What was it? Why, we have been telling the Filipinos that we were going to give them independence. We have told them that for 20 years, and there is no doubt that, sooner or later, independence must be given to them. You can not hold on to that imperialism much longer, and when you give them their independence, are you going to have no reservations to protect them? Are you going to turn them loose without the protection that you yourselves claim in this selfish pact? When it comes down to the proposition of protecting the poor little Filipinos you say no. The reservation introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] provided that when we do grant independence to the Filipinos it is understood that their rights and their territory shall come under the protection of the four-power treaty. Should it not? Then why did you not adopt it? Instead of that, every Republican except four voted against it.

Mr. President, we are bound for 10 years by this treaty, and then for a year after that. Oh, when we were considering the Versailles treaty—yes; when the Versailles treaty was being framed—one of the great complaints in this country was that it would take us too long to get out of that treaty. There was an amendment made to it by the drafters of it by reason of that complaint before it was presented to this body. When it was finally presented to this body it provided that we could get out of that treaty within two years. In the four-power treaty we have no way of getting out of it under 11 years, and yet this amendment to the Brandegee reservation was presented and voted down:

Provided, That the United States agrees to this treaty with the express understanding that it reserves to itself the right to withdraw therefrom at any time any of the other parties to the treaty shall, in the opinion of the President of the United States or of the Congress by joint resolution expressed, wrongfully engage in war with any country, thereby imperiling the peace of the Pacific.

You are unwilling when one these powers wrongfully commences a war, and the President of the United States so declares, or the Congress by joint resolution so affirms, to permit this country to withdraw from this 10-year pact. What excuse have you to offer? You have voluntarily tied your hands for 10 years. You have tied your hands in a pact that may bring wrongful war, and you have provided no means by which you can escape from it. Yet that reservation was voted against by every Republican except four in the Senate.

There was another reservation which attempted to limit the effect of the treaty to the insular possessions and to prevent its extension to the mainland of Siberia and China, lands that have threatened war every hour and every year, and will continue to threaten war until one of the greatest wars of all history breaks loose. Yet there was no effort to protect this country from that danger. Here is the reservation that was offered as an amendment to the Brandegee reservation:

Provided, That the United States agrees to this treaty with the express understanding and reservation that article 2 of said treaty shall not apply to any situation arising out of the military occupation by any of the high contracting parties of any part of the mainland of Asia, including the boundaries of the Chinese or Russian Empires as they existed in 1890.

The Senate understood the danger arising from that mainland situation. The Senate understood that under article 2 if an aggression arose there and extended to the insular possessions of Japan we would be involved in it, and yet that amendment to the Brandegee reservation was voted down by all of the Republicans except four.

Mr. President, I now read another amendment which was offered to the Brandegee reservation:

Provided, That the United States agrees to this treaty with the express understanding that it may withdraw from the same at any time by giving one year's notice of its intention to withdraw.

It was voted down. These were all amendments to the reservation which the Committee on Foreign Relations presented to the Senate. They were really not new reservations; they had to do with the reservation which the Foreign Relations Committee had already approved.

There was another amendment in the nature of a substitute which was offered to the Brandegee reservation by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. It was in form the original reservation presented by the Senator from Connecticut to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate.

Mr. President, the reservation as originally presented by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut was offered by the Senator from California as a substitute for the final Brandegee reservation. I will not read it; it has been read; but I will place it in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, so that those who may desire to study the four-power treaty may have it before them in concise form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The reservation referred to is as follows:

The United States understands that it assumes no obligation, either legal or moral, to maintain the rights in relation to the insular possessions or insular dominions of any of the other high contracting parties; and that the consent of the Congress of the United States shall be necessary to any adjustment or understanding under articles 1 or 2 by which the United States is to be bound in any way, and that there is no obligation, either legal or moral, to give such consent.

APPENDIX.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan,

With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean,

Have determined to conclude a treaty to this effect and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries,

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

I.

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the other high contracting parties to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

II.

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

III.

This treaty shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

IV.

This treaty shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties and shall take effect on the deposit of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate. The Government of the United States will transmit to all the signatory powers a certified copy of the proces verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

The present treaty, in French and in English, shall remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States, and duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to each of the signatory powers.

In faith whereof the above-named plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty.

Done at the city of Washington the 13th day of December, 1921.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification:

The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

March 11 (calendar day, March 18), 1920.

Ordered printed showing the amendments proposed to the resolving clause and paragraph, together with the several reservations as agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, subject to the following reservations and understandings, which are hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, which ratification is not to take effect or bind the United States until the said reservations and understandings adopted by the Senate have been accepted as a part and a condition of this resolution of ratification by the allied and associated powers, and a failure on the part of the allied and associated powers to make objection to said reservations and understandings prior to the deposit of ratification by the United States shall be taken as a full and final acceptance of such reservations and understandings by said powers:

1. The United States so understands and construes article 1 that in case of notice of withdrawal from the League of Nations, as provided in said article, the United States shall be the sole judge as to whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the said covenant have been fulfilled, and notice of withdrawal by the United States may be given by a concurrent resolution of the Congress of the United States.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

3. No mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, part 1, or any other provision of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.

4. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations, or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

5. The United States will not submit to arbitration or to inquiry by the assembly or by the council of the League of Nations, provided for in said treaty of peace, any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said League of Nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.

6. The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, and 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles.

7. No person is or shall be authorized to represent the United States, nor shall any citizen of the United States be eligible, as a member of any body or agency established or authorized by said treaty of peace with Germany, except pursuant to an act of the Congress of the United States providing for his appointment and defining his powers and duties.

8. The United States understands that the Reparation Commission will regulate or interfere with exports from the United States to Germany, or from Germany to the United States, only when the United States by act or joint resolution of Congress approves such regulation or interference.

9. The United States shall not be obligated to contribute to any expenses of the League of Nations, or of the secretariat, or of any commission, or committee, or conference, or other agency, organized under the League of Nations or under the treaty or for the purpose of carrying out the treaty provisions, unless and until an appropriation of funds available for such expenses shall have been made by the Congress of the United States: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply to the United States' proportionate share of the expense of the office force and salary of the secretary general.

10. No plan for the limitation of armaments proposed by the council of the League of Nations under the provisions of article 8 shall be held as binding the United States until the same shall have been accepted by Congress, and the United States reserves the right to increase its armament without the consent of the council whenever the United States is threatened with invasion or engaged in war.

11. The United States reserves the right to permit, in its discretion, the nationals of a covenant-breaking State, as defined in article 16 of the covenant of the League of Nations, residing within the United States or in countries other than such covenant-breaking State, to continue their commercial, financial, and personal relations with the nationals of the United States.

12. Nothing in articles 296, 297, or in any of the annexes thereto or in any other article, section, or annex of the treaty of peace with Germany shall, as against citizens of the United States, be taken to mean any confirmation, ratification, or approval of any act otherwise illegal or in contravention of the rights of citizens of the United States.

13. The United States withholds its assent to part 13 (articles 387 to 427, inclusive) unless Congress by act or joint resolution shall hereafter make provision for representation in the organization established by said part 13, and in such event the participation of the United States will be governed and conditioned by the provisions of such act or joint resolution.

14. Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

15. In consenting to the ratification of the treaty with Germany the United States adheres to the principle of self-determination and to the resolution of sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice adopted by the Senate June 6, 1919, and declares that when such government is attained by Ireland, a consummation it is hoped is at hand, it should promptly be admitted as a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no intention of entering into a discussion of the various points which have been made by the Senator from Nevada. I think I ought to say, however, that when I referred to the denial of the British ambassador I had a very strong impression that the point made here in relation to the first report of what he had said was that he had declared that war was imminent—not "eminent," but imminent—and that he denied.

Now, as to the question of unanimity, it is a commonplace of international law that all actions or agreements of an international body must be unanimous unless otherwise provided. In the treaty of Versailles there were several cases in which a majority was to decide, and therefore, perhaps from a superabundance of caution, the framers of that treaty placed in it the statement that action was always to be unanimous unless otherwise provided.

Mr. President, when I presented the four-power treaty to the plenary council, after I had read it, I said:

The signing of this treaty is, on the part of the United States, subject to the making of a convention with Japan concerning the status of the island of Yap and what are termed the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean north of the Equator, the negotiations in regard to which are almost concluded, and also to the reservations with respect to what are termed the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean south of the Equator.

Then I said:

It should also be observed that the controversies to which the proposed treaty refers do not embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

That is the statement I made when I presented the draft of the treaty on December 10 to the plenary conference. The statements which I then made, and which were accepted, of course, by all the powers present, and afterwards agreed to when the record of the meeting was approved at the next plenary council, were then embodied in the declaration which the representatives of all the powers concerned signed on the same day on which they signed the four-power treaty; in fact, they signed it first. It is a declaration, as stated here, accompanying the four-power treaty.

It was not a part of the treaty; it was not within the ratifying clause; it had not the usual ratifying paragraphs; but it was simply a declaration of the understanding and intent of the signatory powers made by their delegates.

Yesterday when the question was raised I had no opportunity to say anything, because I was cut off by the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement. I desire to say now what I was prepared to say then, if the opportunity had been afforded, that, personally, I should be very glad, indeed, to have the Senate ratify and approve that declaration. If Senators desire this done, I will offer at the proper time a ratifying resolution which will cover the declaration.

Mr. President, I am not going to follow the Senator from Nevada through his elaborate review of the amendments and reservations which perished on yesterday.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield, first, to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator has stated, a question was asked a day or two ago during the course of the debate as to whether or not the treaty, if ratified, would prevent us from applying our coastwise laws to the Philippine Islands. I think the Senator to whom the question was addressed expressed the opinion that there was nothing in the treaty that would prevent us from doing that.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, nothing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no doubt in my mind with reference to it, but I should like for the RECORD a statement from the Senator from Massachusetts, who was one of the delegates to the conference.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad to make it. In the preamble to the four-power treaty and again in the treaty itself, the words "their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions" are used. Of course, the term "their rights" means the sovereign rights of each power in regard to its dominions and possessions, and the right to enact coastwise laws for domestic traffic is an undoubted sovereign right. I do not think that would be questioned by anybody.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I take it, the regulation of coastwise traffic is purely a domestic problem, in the opinion of the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. It is purely a domestic affair, and the other powers to the four-power pact can not possibly interfere with it any more than they can interfere with any of our other domestic legislation.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know whether I fully understand the Senator from Massachusetts, but in characterizing this agreement, what did he call it?

Mr. LODGE. Call what?

Mr. SHIELDS. The paper which he now holds in his hand.

Mr. LODGE. I called it a "declaration," which is the name given to it officially.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand that it is no part of the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. It is no part of the four-power treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is a mere declaration?

Mr. LODGE. It is a declaration of the signatories; that is the way it has been described.

Mr. SHIELDS. How does the Senator describe this language:

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan have, through their respective plenipotentiaries, agreed upon the following stipulations?

Does not a stipulation mean a contract?

Mr. LODGE. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am reading from the supplementary treaty, which is an additional contract, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. I am not talking about the supplementary treaty now; I am talking about the declaration which the Senator from Nevada has been discussing, the declaration accompanying the four-power treaty; I am not speaking about the supplementary treaty at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have just come into the Chamber. Yesterday afternoon the supplementary treaty was taken up. Has that been disposed of this morning?

Mr. LODGE. No; the supplementary treaty is now before the Senate, although the Senator might not guess so from the debate. The word "stipulations" occurs in the supplementary treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts call that a declaration?

Mr. LODGE. No; I call it a treaty, which it is.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is that the matter now before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. That is the matter now before the Senate, but is not the matter about which I was talking. The Senator missed hearing the able speech of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let us talk about the matter before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That would be very unusual.

Mr. SHIELDS. It would be with the Senator from Massachusetts when he is not altogether certain of the path he is traveling.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nevada has been making a long and able speech, reviewing all the amendments and reservations which were voted down yesterday, and giving especial attention to the declaration accompanying the four-power treaty. There is nothing in that treaty about "stipulations" so far as I am aware.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he considers the paper to which we are now referring as a part of the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean the declaration?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not see anything about "declaration" in it; I see something here about "stipulations."

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is reading from the supplementary treaty, while I am talking about the declaration in connection with the four-power treaty; they are two entirely different things.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am asking the Senator a question about what is called the supplementary treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I was coming to that in a moment. I was just about to part company with the declaration.

Mr. SHIELDS. Very well; then I will not interfere with the Senator, but I understood him to call this a "declaration," and I did not understand his language. It seems to me it is a part of the four-power treaty which the Senator omitted yesterday, or forgot about, when he was presenting the four-power treaty for action.

Mr. LODGE. No; the supplementary treaty is at the bottom of the same page—26—but it is entitled "A treaty." I was merely saying, and that is all I have to say on that point, what I was unable to say yesterday—that I shall be glad to offer a ratifying resolution to the declaration if Senators desire. I should like nothing better than to see it ratified by the Senate. I do not think it would add much to it, however.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, does the Senator hold that he still has the power to offer a ratifying resolution for this part of the treaty that was omitted yesterday?

Mr. LODGE. It was not a part of the treaty; but undoubtedly we have a right to ratify and approve that declaration if we choose. We did that in the case of the Bagot notes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has it not been decided by every court to which the question has been submitted that a written instrument signed in connection with another, and contemporaneously with it, is a part of the written agreement?

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware that it was a part of the agreement. I supposed two agreements could be signed on the same day and not be part of each other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that I will present to him this afternoon abundant judicial decisions to that effect——

Mr. LODGE. If they have any bearing on the case, I shall be very glad to have them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That it is in law a part of the written contract entered into at that time. Not only that, Mr. President, but I think I can show to the Senate that the precedent here is to the effect that such declarations as this, signed simultaneously with the treaty and by the parties to the treaty and in the name of the parties, have heretofore been ratified by the Senate at the time the treaty itself was ratified.

Mr. LODGE. Some have and some have not. On that point I can speak. The notes of Mr. Clayton and Sir Henry Bulwer, after the treaty bearing their names, were never approved by the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can show the Senator an instance where notes were ratified, but this is different.

Mr. LODGE. I have just mentioned a case where notes were ratified—the Bagot notes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But this is a different proposition from the exchange of notes. This is a solemn agreement.

Mr. LODGE. This is not an exchange of notes. This is a declaration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a solemn agreement as to the purpose, effect, and application of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It is a declaration as to its intent and understanding. We might as well be exact about the words.

Mr. President, to come back to what is before the Senate, I only desired to say that the treaty is one of extreme simplicity, and the purpose of it is well known to everyone—to exclude the mainland of Japan, the Japanese Empire proper, which is composed of islands, from the provisions of the four-power treaty. The agreement is in a sentence, and was agreed to by all the powers. There can be no question as to its interpretation, and, of course, to change it now might very well mean the loss of the treaty; and I have not supposed that there was really any great anxiety to force the inclusion of Japan within the provisions of the four-power treaty. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have been rather surprised at the offer of the Senator from Massachusetts now at this late day, and a day which I think is too late, to submit to the Senate for ratification this declaratory statement which came to us attached to the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It was not attached to the treaty, Mr. President. It is distinctly stated that it accompanied it. It was not attached to it and not made part of it in any way, and that appears on the face of the document. They were two separate documents, separately signed, and it was not made part of the four-power treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator is drawing rather a fine point there.

Mr. LODGE. I am only stating the plain facts which appear on the face of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All that the Senate has before it is this printed document which is designated as Executive N and in the resolution of ratification the thing that is ratified is the treaty known as Executive N. A part of Executive N is this statement, this declaration, signed by those who negotiated the treaty. Let me read it once more.

Mr. LODGE. I think that would be a good plan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK (reading):

In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers—

Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts said that this was a declaration of the statesmen selected to negotiate the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, how it is printed there is of no consequence. That is the Senate print. In the official print the Senator will observe, if he will look at it, that they are two entirely distinct documents, and were so given. It was a mere accident that it was stuck on that paper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will pass that over for the present, but the Senator from Massachusetts stated yesterday, in attempting to disassociate this from the treaty, that it was a mere declaratory statement of those who negotiated the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That is all it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the document itself shows that that is not correct.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it ought never to have been included in the Senate print. The way it was submitted shows that it was not so at all. It was submitted officially, to be found in the documents accompanying the President's message; and in this reprint that was made from what was presented by the President of the United States they are submitted as two totally distinct documents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For the moment I am passing over that, Mr. President. I shall come back to it. I am calling the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to his error yesterday——

Mr. LODGE. I think I made no error, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When he stated that this was a mere declaration as to the meaning of the treaty made by the men who negotiated it. It is not that.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will prove to the Senator that it is not.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I am very sure it is, because I happened to be one of the signers, and I am very sure that it was a totally different transaction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator would be correct if it stated that "it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signers of this treaty"; but it did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or "the negotiators of this treaty."

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It declared it to be "the understanding and intent of the signatory powers."

Mr. LODGE. It did, and they represented them. There is no use in shouting so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. "The signatory powers" has a meaning.

Mr. LODGE. It has, to those who understand it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is declared to be the meaning of the United States, the meaning of Japan, the meaning of France, and the meaning of Great Britain; and if it is the meaning of those signatory powers, it is something much more than the Senator undertook yesterday to say that it was—a mere declaratory statement of those who negotiated the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I have stated over and over again that that is my opinion, and I think I know and understand it. The Senator is asserting over and over again that that is my error. I do not think it is. I think I am right; and his asserting it does not in the least affect or alter my opinion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not asserting anything. I am reading from the document itself, which states that it is the understanding of the signatory powers.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, that is what it says. I am not denying that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was not what the Senator said it was yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. No; I said it was a declaration by the signers of the document and nothing else, and that is all it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; it is a declaration by the signatory powers.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. We were signing in that capacity. We were unable to sign in any other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And if it is a declaration by the signatory powers, it is a declaration that has to be passed upon by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I have said that I shall be delighted to offer a resolution ratifying and approving it, if the Senator approves it. If he does not approve it, of course there is no use in doing that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I gave the Senator yesterday an opportunity to have it ratified.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator yesterday was engaged in violating the unanimous-consent agreement, and I declined to discuss it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I called it up at an opportunity when the Senator could have moved to recommit the matter to the Committee of the Whole and have it passed on. Instead of taking that natural course, he elected to ignore it and treat it as not part of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I declined to try to make it a part of the treaty when it was not a part of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I say to the Senator now that he has lost his opportunity. He can not at this time, by any method that I can conceive of, except by beginning over again on the treaty, ratify that particular portion of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator does not want to ratify the declaration, I do not care one straw about it. I do not think it matters in the least. I am willing to do it to oblige my friend from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who seemed to put some stress on it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a very much larger question than what the Senator from Massachusetts wants or what I want or what any other individual Senator wants.

Mr. LODGE. Then let the Senator make a motion to go back, and see where he lands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a question which involves the validity of our act yesterday in purporting to ratify that treaty.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can take that into the Supreme Court and try it out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I lay down these propositions: If that declaratory statement of the signatory powers is a part of the treaty that we had up for consideration yesterday, and we ignored it by not reading it and we ignored it by not submitting it to the Senate, we not only failed to ratify that but we failed to ratify the treaty itself.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, I deny absolutely that it is a part of the treaty. I have denied it over and over again, and the Senator goes on saying that it is a part of the treaty. That is denied.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall present to the Senate before we adjourn to-day, or the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is looking up the authorities, will do it, plain proof that a writing contemporaneously made by the same parties who make the main contract becomes by that act a part of the contract itself; and a treaty is nothing more than a contract, except what additional dignity it gains by being made formally by the constituted authorities between two nations or more.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, signing a document on a particular day does not make it part of another document that is signed on the same day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts stated here in the Senate, as I recall, that this was a contemporaneous matter; that the actual fact was that this declaration was signed even in advance of the main treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It was signed in advance; yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That act, making it contemporaneous, made it a part of the treaty; and it is just as much a part of the treaty as though it were written into this treaty at the proper place.

Mr. LODGE. If that is a comfort to the Senator, I have not the slightest objection to his taking that view.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, perhaps, is aware of the fact that in the past treaties negotiated and having these supplemental or additional or declaratory or interpretative paragraphs made have specifically declared that they had the same force and effect as the main treaty, and the same force and effect as though they were written in word for word.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and in many other instances there have been contemporaneous things which were not embodied in that way in the treaty. If the Senator will pursue his researches a little further, he can find them. The treaty with Portugal was one. I will give him that clew.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not had much time to look up the precedents, but I have found a number of cases——

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly; it is a common thing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In which the Senate has not only ratified the main treaty but in which the Senate has ratified supplemental or contemporaneous agreements.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it has been done over and over again; and what of it? It has been done the other way also.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is possible the Senator can find instances where it was done the other way, but I can not recall them.

Mr. LODGE. I can find them.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not the Senator's position that these declarations submitted with the treaty do in fact constitute a part of the treaty submitted?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; they become a part of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Then will not the Senator admit that the resolution of ratification covers the declarations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; because the rules of the Senate require that a treaty must be read article by article, and read in full to the Senate, for the purpose of giving opportunity for amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator this question——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish first. That was not read to the Senate. No opportunity was afforded the Senate to pass upon it; no opportunity was afforded the Senate to amend it, although I took the occasion to call it formally to the attention of the Senate, without being given much opportunity to explain it. Then there was an opportunity for the Senator from Massachusetts to move to recommit the treaty to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering it. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's position that if a rule of the Senate is violated it invalidates the official action taken upon the subject matter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does if it is contemporaneously called to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator can not find any authority to sustain that position. It is all the other way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the record has to show a legal ratification of this treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is the final action which the court will examine, and the final action is the action on the resolution of ratification, and when the Senator says that the declarations form a part of the treaty he admits that they are covered by the resolution of ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator is precluded from taking that position. If I had remained silent, if there were nothing in the record to show that there was a refusal to read that treaty to the Senate, then I think there might be something in the Senator's contention. The record would not show that. I made the record show, first, that the declaration was not read; second, when a demand was made for it, it was refused. Any court in passing upon it is bound to say that that was not a legally ratified treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator take the position that the Senate can not violate its own rules?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does an illegal act when it ratifies a treaty in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. What makes it illegal?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose the Senate should undertake to ratify a treaty by a 51 per cent vote of its Members, and suppose the record showed that. Does the Senator claim that any court would say that such a treaty was ratified legally?

Mr. LENROOT. No; because that is covered by the Constitution; but if a rule of the Senate which requires a certain vote complies with the constitutional direction, that rule being in addition to the requirement of the Constitution, its violation would not affect the validity for a second.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Constitution gives the Senate the right to make its rules, and the Constitution giving the Senate, which is a coordinate body, the right to make its rules, any court will say that an attempt to ratify a treaty in direct violation of the rules which have been made in accordance with the constitutional power of the Senate is not a legal ratification.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska is not a lawyer, but I would be willing to have him submit to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], or any Democratic lawyer on the other side of the aisle, whether he is not mistaken as to that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the position of the Senator from Nebraska is substantially correct, if I understand his position. Let me give a concrete case which seems to me must justify his position, or it would subject the Senate to the charge of perpetrating a fraud upon itself and upon the American people.

Assume that the treaty which we ratified yesterday contained a reservation, or a supplemental agreement—and it does contain one, to which the Senator is now calling attention—and that reservation or supplemental provision of the treaty declared something which was inconsistent with the treaty itself.

For instance, assume that the treaty included within it domestic affairs, and that the declaration to which the Senator is now calling attention excluded domestic affairs from the operation of the treaty. Assume that the Senator from Massachusetts presented both instruments, assuming, however, that one of them was to be presented on the following day or voted upon separately or not voted upon at all, and he read only the first treaty, which included domestic affairs within the operation of the treaty, and neglected to read the other part, which excluded them, and Senators voted for the first treaty upon the theory that the latter would be submitted to them so that they could vote upon it, because they were contemporaneous instruments.

Obviously, if it were a contract, they both would have to be considered together. Being a treaty, both would have to be construed together, and if we ratified one and the Senator from Massachusetts did not present the other and the Senate did not ratify it, then I submit that, while possibly in international law we might be bound by the first, it would be such a fraud that we would be justified immediately in repudiating the first treaty, notifying the signatories to the treaty that we repudiated it because a fraud had been perpetrated in the Senate, and a part of the treaty, to wit, the supplemental or declaratory statement, had not been submitted so that we could vote upon it. So the Senator from Nebraska in his ultimate conclusion obviously is right.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Utah will at once agree that he can not accept the construction of the Senator from Nebraska that these declarations form a part of the treaty, in coming to the conclusion which the Senator has reached. The Senator in his statement assumes that they are two different instruments. The Senator from Nebraska insists that the declarations are a part of the treaty, and my point is that if they are a part of the treaty those declarations have been included in the resolution of ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator's position is almost impossible. If there ever is a serious thing which the Senate of the United States does, it is the ratification of a treaty; and the Constitution of the United States specifically requires that there must be a two-thirds vote to ratify a treaty. The record must show that there was a two-thirds vote when it was done. That same Constitution gives to the Senate of the United States the power to make the rules under which it will proceed, and the Senate has made those rules and Senators have a right to rely upon those rules and to assume that those rules will be lived up to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to finish my statement. There has grown up here a rather careless habit in acting upon treaties. The other day we ratified a treaty upon the same day on which it was considered as in Committee of the Whole, without having it lie over a day; but you made the record show that it was all right. In this particular case the record does not show that. The record does not show that this was a legal ratification. The record shows that this part of the treaty was not read to the Senate. The record shows that Senators did not have an opportunity to pass upon it. The record shows that it was not voted upon, and the record shows, furthermore, that when I called it to the attention of the Senate, even then no steps were taken to rectify the omission.

Under those circumstances there is a record of an attempt to ratify a treaty by the notorious violation of the rules of the Senate; and not only that, but it is just the same as if we ratified that treaty without reading a word of it. To fail to read those two paragraphs of the treaty is just the same as though it had been presented here and we had attempted to ratify it without reading a single word of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly; and could we not have done it if two-thirds voted for it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States can ratify a treaty without even reading it, I must confess that it seems to me we have reduced the matter to an absolute absurdity, and I do not think it is true. I do not believe that the United States Supreme Court, which has the right to pass upon and construe treaties, just as it has the right to pass upon and construe other laws of the United States, would say that the Senate had performed its constitutional function in its act of attempted ratification.

Mr. LENROOT. The court has said just that in numerous instances. There are two distinguished lawyers here, members of the Senator's own party, and I am very sure that both of them will assure the Senator that the United States Supreme Court will never inquire into the parliamentary forms which have been followed or as to whether the rules have been violated. We may violate every rule of the Senate, but if we take the action upon a measure which is required by the Constitution it is valid.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am not asserting that the Supreme Court would take a mere statement of a litigant that the Senate of the United States had not gone through the legal forms in ratifying this treaty. The point I am making is that if the Supreme Court comes to examine this record it will have a right to inquire as to the act of the Senate in ratifying that treaty. Here is a legal record before the Senate. Here is a record made in open Senate. This is not a case of a litigant claiming that the legal requirements in connection with the ratification of a treaty have not been complied with. Here is the proof; here is the record showing that there was no ratification.

Mr. LENROOT. But there was a legal ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. I do not believe—and I am amazed that the Senator from Wisconsin should assert it—that a mere farce could be enacted here which would be called a ratification; that the Senate could meet, for instance, and merely have the title to a treaty read, and vote to ratify it without having the parts of the treaty considered. The mere act of ratification involves consideration. The mere act of ratification involves reading the treaty itself. The Senate can not consider a thing that is not read. It is utterly impossible.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I assert as a legal proposition that we could at this moment have a treaty submitted to the Senate by the President of the United States, a resolution of ratification could be immediately offered, the treaty never having been read to the Senate, and if it received a two-thirds vote the ratification would be just as valid as if every rule of the Senate had been complied with.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course that is the Senator's position. He is bound to take that position.

Mr. LENROOT. It is the position of every lawyer in the Senate who is familiar with the subject.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me the Senator's contention is this: The record shows that a certain document was before the Senate and acted upon. The record shows this supplemental declaration was not before the Senate and acted upon. No roll call was had upon it. Consequently, it is simply an understanding between the parties, not ratified by the Senate. I do not see how anyone could say a matter that was not presented to the Senate, not read to the Senate, not before the Senate, could be considered as having been ratified. The record shows that the Senator from Nebraska tried to bring it up. It shows that it was not considered by the Senate, and I do not see how it can be held to have been considered. This part of it was not considered by the Senate at all, was it?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it was not.

Mr. SWANSON. How could the Senate act on a thing that was not before it?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Nebraska insists that the declaration is a part of the treaty. If it be a part of the treaty, then it is covered by the resolution of ratification. If it be a separate instrument, of course the Senate never has acted upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not claim that it is a part of the treaty now. I claim that the negotiators of this treaty sent one treaty to the Senate, and the Senate ratified another. We did not ratify what was sent here. That is what I mean. I mean that the negotiators of this treaty sent the treaty here with the declaratory statement in it, which makes it one kind of a treaty, and we ratified something entirely different.

Mr. LENROOT. We ratified what was sent to us as a part of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; we did not. The Senator from Massachusetts declared at the time that it was not a part of the treaty. I am prepared to show it is a part of the treaty as negotiated. The negotiators negotiated one treaty, and the Senate has undertaken to ratify another.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator say that if it is not a part of the treaty the Senate has not acted upon it, but if it is a part of the treaty it is covered by the resolution?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not say that at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I say is this, that the treaty as negotiated was one thing; the treaty as ratified is another thing. We have ratified something that has not been negotiated. They negotiated something which we have not ratified. You can not claim that there is a legal ratification under those circumstances, and I do not care what quibbles the Senator indulges in.

Moreover, I think it rather a demoralizing position and not a creditable position for responsible Senators to take here that we can have a great instrument like this shrouded in this doubt. We have supposed that a treaty was of enough dignity and importance so that there should be no doubt as to what was ratified and what was agreed. To have doubt is to involve ultimately one or two or more nations in war with each other, perhaps. We have entered into an agreement with these three other countries. Part of that agreement that they agreed to contains these very important paragraphs. We have ratified a different instrument without even giving those paragraphs consideration.

We have nominally a ratification. We may even have legally a ratification. I shall not undertake to split hairs with the Senator, but the very offer made by the Senator from Massachusetts to-day to proceed to the ratification of this declaration shows that you know you have not ratified the declaration. You have not protected the people of the United States. I call the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] that you have not protected the people of California from having immigration made a question that these four powers can pass on.

What was the supplemental declaratory statement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Touching the matter of the colloquy between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Wisconsin, doubtless the Senator from Wisconsin is quite right that the Supreme Court would not inquire into the parliamentary procedure by which ratification was arrived at. The Supreme Court would simply determine the matter upon the certification of the document; it would not look into the record at all. It would take up the document bearing the signature of the proper officers of the Senate showing that it was passed by a two-thirds vote. If the officers of the Senate should sign below the supplemental declaration found on page 7 and certify that the "foregoing treaty," which of course would include the supplemental document, was approved and ratified by the Senate, that would end the thing so far as the Supreme Court is concerned.

I apprehend probably the officers of the Senate would do nothing of the kind. They would not dare to do anything of that kind, because they know that nothing of the kind happened. They would certify by their signatures under the treaty as it is found in the printed document down to and including page 6 and they would attach their signatures thereto. Then the attention of the Supreme Court would be called to the fact that only a part of the treaty had been ratified, because the other document, signed the same day, at the same time, under the indisputable rules of law and construction forms a part of it and the two constitute one and the same treaty. So the question probably is not so simple as it might seem, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Senator from Montana. That bears out what I said, that the negotiators negotiated one treaty and the Senate has undertaken to ratify another.

Mr. KING. Or a part of one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They call it a treaty. They can not do that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to the contention made by the Senator from Montana that the Supreme Court should determine that this declaration was a part of the treaty, if the Supreme Court had the resolution of ratification in exactly this form before it would it not hold that the treaty, whatever it was, was ratified?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is a queer position to take.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Suppose an article of the treaty had been omitted in the certificate, but it is shown that it was a part of the treaty covered by the resolution of ratification——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It could not be shown, except by extraneous evidence.

Mr. LENROOT. It might be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. The document is there and that article is not in it. Now, if anyone contends that it ought to be in it, it would require extraneous evidence to show it. Here the court takes judicial notice of the fact that these two things were negotiated——

Mr. LENROOT. Very well, the court takes judicial notice——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And that they constitute one and the same document.

Mr. LENROOT. A certificate is made that the treaty made on such and such day was ratified by the resolution of ratification that is incorporated in the certificate. The Supreme Court then, if it sustains the contention of the Senator from Nebraska, will be compelled to hold that the declaration is also ratified. Of course, if the court holds that it is not a part of the treaty, but a separate document, it will not be ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there is a very much higher question here and a much larger question than is involved in a mere technicality. I ask why was it decided not to ratify this declaratory statement, just as other similar statements have been ratified by other treaties in the past? For instance, in a treaty made between the United States and Sweden and Norway in 1827, after the negotiators of that treaty—Appleton upon the part of the United States and Wetterstedt on the part of Norway and Sweden—had agreed to the 20 articles of the treaty, they found it necessary to add a separate article, which they signed on the same day, just as this declaratory statement was signed on the same day by the same men who had negotiated the treaty. It was declared in that article desirable "to remove from their commercial relations all kinds of ambiguity or motives of discussions," just as it was intended in this declaratory statement here to remove ambiguity. That article, which has exactly the same effect as this declaratory statement and interprets ambiguities or removes ambiguities and makes possible doubt plain, was ratified by the Senate of the United States, just as this should have been ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. Was it not expressly stated in that article that it became a part of the treaty itself?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it was; but it does not matter whether the signers state that it becomes a part of the treaty itself or whether the law makes it a part of the treaty itself, if it is a contemporaneous writing signed by the same men at the same time and relating to the same subject, it becomes a part of the contract, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. SPENCER. I can see how the effect might be to explain the provisions of the treaty, but when the signers of the treaty make what the Senator from Massachusetts has called a declaration, and in that declaration refer expressly to a different document, to a treaty which they have this day signed, and then go on to make some explanation of what that treaty, that separate document, signifies, does not the Senator think that at least creates the situation that there is a separate treaty, a separate document, at least, which has been signed, and therefore when we have ratified that separate signed document which is referred to as a treaty in the declaration, we at least have ratified that document?

The Senator may or may not be right. For the purposes of the argument I admit that this declaration constituted, if you like, another treaty, an explanatory treaty, which may or may not have needed ratification; but certainly this declaration refers to a separate document which is called a treaty and which had been formally executed, and that separate document we ratified yesterday in all its particulars.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not conceive that what the men who signed the treaty stated makes any difference. It is a question of law. It is a contemporaneous document signed by the same men, relating to the same subject, and sent to the Senate at the same time, constituting, as the Secretary of State evidently thinks it does, one transaction.

Mr. SPENCER. Would I not answer the Senator from Nebraska by this illustration? Suppose that in this so-called declaration the signers had expressly stated they did not intend this to be a part of the treaty, that they intended it to be merely an explanation of what the treaty contains. Certainly the Senator from Nebraska would not argue that it then became a part of the treaty, merely because it was signed by the same parties on the same day.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. During the course of the debate the Senator from Nebraska has been several times asked by my friend the Senator from Wisconsin to invite my view respecting the effect of the action taken yesterday on the provisions to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred, namely, the explanatory declaration signed by the signatories to the four-power treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator I know wants to quote me correctly. My invitation was to ask the view of the Senator from Arkansas upon the right of the Senate to violate its own rules without affecting the validity of the instrument.

Mr. ROBINSON. Unquestionably the Supreme Court of the United States would not inquire into the question as to whether or not the Senate, in advising and consenting to a treaty, had pursued the course which its rules contemplate. It is undoubtedly true, as stated and implied by the Senator from Wisconsin, that the Senate is at liberty by unanimous consent to violate its own rules in every particular save where those rules are made in conformity to requirements of the Constitution. In that respect, of course, the Senate can not disregard its rules.

Nevertheless the position of the Senator from Nebraska that the signatories to this treaty intended that the declaration should be a part of the treaty is, in my opinion, justified by the language of the declaration itself. I called the attention of the Senate to that fact during the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. In signing the declaration they do not assume to speak as individuals; they assume to speak in the name of the signatory powers whom they represent. For that reason I had understood throughout the progress of the debate that the declaration under consideration was intended to be a part of the treaty.

The Senator from Massachusetts, when his attention was called to the matter yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska, announced in open session of the Senate, and it is printed in the RECORD this morning, that this declaration, in his opinion, was no part of the treaty, that there was no intention or purpose to submit it to the Senate; that the Senate should be denied any opportunity to pass upon the matter; and that course was taken. In view of that declaration and in view of the well-known fact that the Senate not only did not pass upon the declaratory statement but was denied the opportunity to pass upon it when the attention of those in charge of the treaty was called to the subject, will the Senator from Wisconsin or anyone else contend that the declaration by virtue of the adoption of the resolution of ratification became a part of the treaty?

The Senator from Massachusetts repeated this morning the statement made yesterday, repeated it emphatically, and has even gone to the length of expressing his impatience with anyone who would take the contrary view. He said he experienced considerable disgust that anyone would assert that the declaration is a part of the treaty. Certainly, whatever may have been the intention of the signatories, the declaration was not advised and consented to by the Senate, because the Senate was denied the opportunity to pass upon the matter.

There is no question in my mind that this declaration is not a part of the treaty. If it is to become effectual as a treaty, or as anything more than a mere extra judicial statement of the men who signed it, as constituting their opinion of the meaning of the treaty, it must be submitted to the Senate and disposed of in a constitutional way. That has not been done, and the privilege of doing that has been denied the Senate. It would not only be violative of the Constitution and violative of all principles of orderly procedure, but it would be violative of common honesty to say that the United States Senate should be held to have ratified a declaration which it was expressly denied the opportunity of considering.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think that we should take account of the fact that this declaratory statement was, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has stated, actually signed in advance of the main treaty. I do not know that that adds much force to the contention, but it certainly, to my mind, gives warrant for the statement that every word written into that declaratory statement was intended to have exactly the same force and effect as if it had been written into the main body of the treaty, just as other declaratory statements in the past have contained the specific statement that they were intended to have that same force and effect. But, Mr. President, while I do not know how the proponents of this treaty intend to extricate themselves from their position, they have at least succeeded in casting a great doubt over this document. There will be an endless dispute, if it is left as it now is, as to whether the three paragraphs of the declaratory statement are or are not a part of the treaty. There will be a dispute as to whether or not the nations have agreed to the things which are stated in this part of the treaty.

Evidently it was considered by those who drew the treaty that it was not specific and definite enough in its terms. They have boasted here that it was a wonderfully short document, and yet they have been compelled to adopt, first, a declaratory statement explaining the meaning, and finally a supplemental treaty to explain it further. We have actually here three documents now, apparently, instead of one particular treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. To emphasize the view of the Senator from Nebraska that this treaty may lead to disputes or complications, I desire to suggest to the Senator this situation: Suppose that some controversy shall arise between the United States and Japan, and Japan shall insist that domestic questions fall within the treaty; that is to say, that the United States under the treaty is compelled to submit its domestic concerns to the consideration of the parties to the treaty; then the signatories, other than the United States, agree with Japan and take the view that the treaty as originally drawn does not exclude domestic concerns of the United States from the operation of the treaty. Then the United States says, "For the purpose of negativing that position we call your attention to this supplemental declaration which is found on page 7 of the treaty," and Japan replies, "But that was never ratified; you elected to ratify the treaty in a form which we insist brings your domestic affairs within the jurisdiction of the treaty and did not take advantage of the excluding provision. Why did you not ratify the excluding part of the treaty? You did not ratify what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] declared to be the declaratory part. That conclusively establishes the point that you intended that your domestic affairs should come within the operation of the treaty." The Senator from Nebraska can see that immediately there is ground for controversy. If it was intended that the domestic affairs of the United States should not be included within the treaty, why did we not ratify that part of the treaty, a contemporaneous agreement, that expressly excludes them? The Senator from Nebraska is correct in his premise that there is ground for controversy in view of the attitude in which we are left by the obstinacy of the Republican leader and the Republican majority.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President, I was coming to that question; and I think there lies behind this situation a very peculiar thought.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia rose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will allow me to proceed for a moment, I desire to ask what was the object of the declaratory statement? Obviously it contemplates two purposes. The first, as embodied in paragraph 1, was evidently urged by Japan. Japan wanted this treaty to cover the mandated islands which she had seized from Germany; Japan wanted the United States to include the mandated islands in her possessions; and Japan evidently secured that first portion of the declaratory statement, which provides that the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific. Japan evidently was in doubt as to whether the treaty itself included the mandated islands, and she wanted a specific declaration that it should include the mandated islands. That concession was made to Japan, and it was declared that the treaty should apply to the mandated islands. The United States conceded that, wrongfully, I think. I do not think that we should include the mandated islands. Japan has no such title to the mandated islands as she has to her other island possessions; Japan is only a trustee for those islands under the authority of the League of Nations; but we have consented in that first paragraph to include the mandated islands in the insular possessions of Japan, which we practically, in a way, guarantee.

Now, let me come to a second point. In a moment I shall yield to the Senator from Georgia. As an offset for that, in the second paragraph, the negotiators of the United States evidently demanded of Japan that she should specifically agree that domestic questions, such as immigration, should not be included in the questions to be adjusted by the four powers. That was evidently a demand of the United States. The paragraph reads:

> 2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

That is the American position, which we required Japan in that declaratory statement to concede, and it was conceded not simply by the representatives who signed the statement, but it was conceded by the signatory powers referred to in the first few lines. Now, what becomes of that position? If that portion of the statement is not a part of the treaty and is not ratified, what becomes of our domestic questions? As the Senator from Utah has well said, it leaves Japan free to claim that domestic questions come within the purview of the treaty, and she can still agitate the question of immigration in California and still have a cause for trouble with us and a cause for negotiation with us.

But how about the Japanese mandated islands? Oh, they are provided for in the supplemental treaty which is before the Senate to-day. In that document we agree to include her mandated islands; Japan's interests are safeguarded, for that treaty provides:

The term "insular possessions and insular dominions" used in the aforesaid treaty shall, in its application to Japan, include only Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin), Formosa, and the Pescadores, and the islands under the mandate of Japan.

Japan is protected; but where is there anything in this supplemental agreement which will protect the United States in the assertion that domestic questions shall not be included in the four-power pact, and which will prevent domestic questions being dragged by Japan into the provisions of the four-power pact? It seems to me rather strange that the representatives of the United States, after Japan had secured the concession as to the recognition of her mandated islands, should have dropped the only protection we had against immigration among the possible questions that might be dragged before the tribunal of the four powers created by this pact.

So I say that this presents a very serious question for the United States, and it raises a question upon the Pacific coast which Senators will have to take into account sooner or later, because, if it is omitted from the treaty, it is an abandonment of the concession which we wrung from Japan that immigration should not be considered among the questions subject to the jurisdiction of the four powers.

Mr. President, I do not know what the responsible leaders of the majority of the Senate propose to do about this situation. They have certainly succeeded by their performance in getting this treaty into the realm of doubt and uncertainty. There is nobody here who can say with authority and definitely whether or not that declaratory statement has been ratified. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] claims that it is ratified, while the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says it is not a part of the treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator must not misquote me again. I stated that if this declaration is a part of the treaty, as is contended by the Senator from Nebraska, then it is ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Leaving the "if" out, what does the Senator from Wisconsin think?

Mr. LENROOT. Taking the statement of one of the signatories that this was an independent document and an independent understanding arrived at, it is my view that it is not covered by the resolution of ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator takes that horn of the dilemma that the declaratory statement made by the representatives of the four powers has not been ratified by the Senate and need not be ratified by Japan, and that we are, then, in the position of having unsettled the matter whether or not immigration is subject to the jurisdiction of the four powers. It does not matter which horn of the dilemma we may take, we are in trouble.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me it is not difficult to show that the declaratory statement which has been referred to has not been ratified. No treaty is effective until there is a concurrence of the Executive mind and the mind of the Senate expressed by a two-thirds majority. There has certainly been no concurrence of these two minds in the declaratory statement, because the very record of the Senate shows that there has been no opportunity to express any concurrence in that provision.

The certificate of the Secretary is prima facie, but not conclusive. Whether fraudulently or otherwise, it is possible that a misstatement of the facts might be made; but the Supreme Court in examining the question would consider the Journal of the Senate to ascertain whether there has been a concurrence, expressed by a two-thirds majority, between the Executive and the legislative mind. No one can contend that there has been any such concurrence in connection with a matter which has never been presented to the Senate even for consideration. The declaratory statement lacks the concurrence of a two-thirds vote to give it effect as a treaty provision.

So it seems to me the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin is well founded that it requires a separate resolution of ratification to make the declaration effective and to show affirmatively that the legislative mind of the Senate by a two-thirds majority has concurred in it. My recollection from reading cases before the Supreme Court involving the tariff and other matters is that the court have said that the rules amount to nothing; the question to be ascertained is, Has the legislative mind consented as provided by the Constitution? That is what the Supreme Court has held in various cases which have come before it as to whether or not a law or a treaty was duly passed or ratified. It has expressed the view that it is not governed by the rules, but it is governed by a determination whether the legislative mind has consented. The very records in connection with the four-power treaty, as disclosed by the proceedings of yesterday, will show that the legislative mind did not consent to this declaratory statement. I think both the record and the Journal will so show.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator will concede, will he not, that if this declaration is an integral part of the treaty, as contended for by the Senator from Nebraska, the record shows that the legislative mind has consented?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator's position is based on the assumption that the legislative mind must consent to a treaty as an entirety. That was the old rule in Napoleon's time; a treaty or a law was accepted or rejected as an entirety when he was consul or emperor; but there is nothing in the Constitution that requires us to accept a treaty as an entirety. We can accept it in part, or we can reject it, or we can do as we please. I say there has been no concurrence of the legislative and executive mind except as to the terms of the original treaty itself. To say that a concurrence can be implied is erroneous. A concurrence can not be implied. In order to make a treaty effective it must be shown affirmatively under the Constitution that the Executive mind and mind of the Senate have concurred, and it must be shown by the Journal, in which the votes are recorded. It must be shown by the records kept by this legislative body, and the records will show exactly the reverse; that this part of the treaty, if it is a part, has not been concurred in, has not been ratified.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, when we say that we advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, that is advice and consent to every part of the treaty, and any part that is not consented to must be expressly excepted. Will not the Senator agree to that?

Mr. SWANSON. I have exactly the contrary idea. The Constitution says that in order for a treaty to be effective it must be shown affirmatively that two-thirds of the Senate has consented to it.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senate could ratify half of it, one-third of it, or the entirety; but the records of the Senate disclose that only this portion of it has been consented to.

Mr. LENROOT. No, no; the record that governs is the resolution of ratification.

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is what was before the Senate. The Senator can look at the Journal. The Journal will show that that matter was not before the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. I am surprised at the Senator from Virginia. Will not the Senator admit that the final act of the legislative body is what governs, and if the final act says that the treaty is advised and consented to it covers every portion of the treaty?

Mr. SWANSON. No; then the Journal will show what portion of that treaty was before the Senate and acted upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. Take an act of legislation. It is necessary to show what the legislative body consented to. That must be affirmatively shown.

Mr. LENROOT. Take a bill. The same rule would apply. If we had here a section in a bill, and the Journal did not show that that particular section was before the Senate, but it was in the bill as finally enacted, would the Senator say that that was not an effective part of the bill?

Mr. SWANSON. If it was never before the Senate, the Senate did not act on it.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is before the Senate on final action. That is the point.

Mr. SWANSON. That was not before the Senate for final action. It must be before the Senate for final action, and the Senate must finally act on it before it becomes valid. It can not be done in any other way.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether, in his opinion, the Secretary, in certifying the record of the proceedings yesterday and in certifying the treaty, will certify that that declaratory statement of the delegates to the conference was passed upon by the Senate and constitutes a part of the treaty? If he did, he would certify to a fraud.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would not anticipate that the Secretary of the Senate would attempt to decide that question. I should expect that the Secretary of the Senate would recite the facts of the submission of the document and certify to the adoption of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that when the treaty is prepared in final form the Secretary would be compelled to certify as to what is the treaty?

Mr. ROBINSON. After the repeated statements of the Senator from Massachusetts, and even the statement recently made by the Senator from Wisconsin that this declaration was no part of the treaty and had not been advised and consented to, and after the further fact that the Senate was denied the opportunity of passing upon it, does the Senator suppose that if the Secretary of the Senate certified that this declaration had been ratified, advised, and consented to by the Senate it would preclude a court from investigating the matter as a fraud?

Mr. KING. I think not. Certainly it would be a fraudulent certification upon the part of the Secretary.

Mr. LENROOT. None of the Senators claim that the Secretary is required to or should do anything except recite the facts, and let some one else draw his conclusions.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Secretary does not certify the facts. He does not certify the proceedings of the Senate. He certifies the record.

Mr. LENROOT. The final record.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator from Wisconsin disposed to revise his opinion, expressed a little while ago, when he agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts that this is not a part of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. I said I took the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that this was a separate agreement and understanding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then it is not a part of the treaty. Very well. Then we are in the position that, having opened the conference by a prayer which excluded the mention of Christ in order to satisfy the Japanese, we close the matter by abandoning the declaration which excludes a domestic question, like that of immigration, from the jurisdiction of these powers. That is the beginning and the end of the conference.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if this is no part of the treaty, this separate agreement is still before the Senate for action. That is all there is to it. There can be no other conclusion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now the Senator has entered into another and entirely different situation. The Senate of the United States may ratify a matter in that way if it undertakes by strong-arm methods to ratify a section of the treaty as negotiated, but Japan will not ratify it. The Senator knows that Japan will not ratify it. It will be null. You can not secure the ratification of Japan unless you have it a part of this treaty which Japan wants.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. We now see why it was that this short document was not rewritten and this thing inserted in it. It was put off upon the country in very much the same way as a codicil would be put to a will by a man who did not want to rewrite his will and put into the body of it what the separate clause in the codicil contained. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that they have played a trick upon the country and upon the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. In line with something that the Senator has said concerning this domestic question, not as indorsing the facts—because I know nothing at all of them—I want to read a dispatch that appeared in the Sacramento Bee recently, from the city of Seattle. I think it may be interesting:

SEATTLE, March 16.

Unless there is "mental disarmament," declared Hiroshi Saito, secretary to the Japanese delegation at the recent Washington conference, in an address before the Rotary Club here yesterday, "the destroying of a few ships will be of no avail."

The Japanese diplomat stated that mental disarmament will require the United States to lift the present bars against the Japanese.

Referring to the Japanese situation on the Pacific coast, Saito stated that "All pending questions between the United States and Japan have practically been solved except that of Japanese residents on the coast. If you approach this problem on a broad international basis, it can also be solved." The speaker declared that the prosperity of the Pacific coast is bound up with that of the Far East.

While he avoided any direct statement with reference to the building of warships before the 10-year period is up, he made it plain that a tremendous campaign is to be launched at once and wholesale propaganda is to be spread in behalf of Japanese citizenship and landownership rights within the United States. The plan is to club the United States into line in behalf of these demands in exchange for continuing the naval holiday.

The "broad international basis," according to Saito, would grant to Japan everything they are asking within the borders of the United States.

If they are not granted, he said, in substance, if these purely domestic questions continue to be treated as purely domestic problems by the United States, then Japan stands ready to prepare for war by discontinuing the naval holiday principle.

I think this is an Associated Press dispatch. It is printed in a newspaper of the very highest standing and widest influence in the State of California.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts cling to the horn of the dilemma which they now occupy, we are then in the position that this is a separate document; that Japan can ratify the main treaty and leave this out, and through the rather extraordinary and revolutionary methods advocated by the Senator from Massachusetts this declaration can be brought in here and given the ratification of the Senate, although it was only a part of a treaty already ratified. We may ratify that declaration; Japan may reject it; and then we will be in the position of having lost what was evidently deemed of some importance, I suppose—that domestic questions shall be excluded from the jurisdiction of the four powers bound together in this alliance. That is the position we are in, according to the theory which the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin now adopt.

Mr. LODGE. It is not in the treaty at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not in the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then they have negotiated a treaty and yielded to Japan everything that Japan demanded as to the recognition of the mandated islands and not secured what they purport to secure in this declaration. They have not secured it because we failed to ratify it. Japan can ratify the rest of the treaty and decline to ratify this declaratory statement, although, as I say, by revolutionary methods I suppose the majority is capable of attempting to ratify this fraction of a treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question? He has just observed that the declaration respecting the elimination from the conference of domestic questions is not in the treaty, and that statement the Senator from Massachusetts has made several times; and I am sure that, whether it was intended to be in the treaty in the beginning or not, it is not in it now, because it was not advised and consented to by the Senate. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts why that declaration was not incorporated into the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The opinion was—it is my opinion, as I stated when I presented it—that the four-power treaty has no relation whatever to domestic questions, and they can not be forced in under it in any way.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but. Mr. President, in connection with the four-power treaty there was entered into a declaration explanatory of its provisions to the effect that domestic questions were not included. If the Senator from Massachusetts, as one of the representatives of this Government, thought it important enough to sign such a declaration in advance of executing the four-power treaty, I repeat my question as to why it was not made a part of the four-power treaty, so that the respective Governments in advising and consenting to the ratification of that treaty would at the same time advise and consent to the construction placed upon the treaty by the Senator from Massachusetts and those who joined with him in negotiating it? Why was it left so that Japan could ratify the four-power treaty and refuse to ratify the construction of the four-power treaty which the Senator from Massachusetts impliedly insists upon?

Mr. LODGE. The signatory powers all agreed to the declaration and all signed it, and I do not apprehend that they are any more dishonest than other nations. I think they will adhere to their declaration. It does not bind us without the action of the Senate any more than it binds them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if we decline to act upon it, if the Senate fails to advise and consent to it, may not Japan very properly say that, it being no part of the treaty, she will place a construction upon it hereafter that she has placed upon it heretofore; that she will insist upon the settlement of these so-called domestic questions in any way she can? That is the real acute controversy between this Government and Japan. What is accomplished by entering into a declaration of this nature? What is the benefit of it to the United States?

Mr. LODGE. It is to avoid any possible misunderstanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. But do we avoid any possible misunderstanding?

Mr. LODGE. I think we do. They all agreed to that understanding; they all accepted it. If it is a part of the treaty, we have ratified it. If it is not a part of the treaty, we can still do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If it was important to have an understanding about the matter, if it was necessary to settle this question by a declaration of understanding before the four-power treaty was signed, I repeat my question to the Senator from Massachusetts and to other Senators, why was it not incorporated into the treaty so as to remove all doubt as to whether it would become the interpretation of the Governments or remain the mere interpretation of the individuals signing it?

Mr. CARAWAY. May I suggest to my colleague, if it is not a part of the treaty it has no more binding effect than if it had been written on a board.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not; it is a mere statement by individuals who signed that treaty as to what their construction of it is.

Mr. CARAWAY. What their construction ought to have been, not what it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. If they had intended to bind their Governments, if they had intended to secure for California the protection which is implied in this reservation, they would have put it in the treaty.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator what the attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts was with reference to this same question when the treaty of Versailles was before the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Massachusetts then insisted upon the insertion of language into the treaty which would remove the possibility of the League of Nations council considering any question which the United States thought was a domestic question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Specifically mentioning, among others, immigration. At that time the Senator from Massachusetts was very anxious to protect this country from any possibility that any tribunal could take jurisdiction of the immigration question, and he was not satisfied with the statement in the treaty itself, which is just as strong as the statement in this treaty. He insisted on having a reservation drawn and incorporated with the act of ratification, providing specifically that immigration should be excluded from the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

Mr. LODGE. I did, to remove a doubt which was in that treaty. There is no doubt in this treaty whatsoever, in my judgment, on the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Evidently it was thought there was some doubt when this matter was brought up here, because in the part of the treaty which you have refused to ratify there is this provision:

> That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

There evidently was some doubt in the mind of somebody before that treaty was signed as to whether domestic questions might be claimed to come within the jurisdiction of this four-power tribunal.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask, were we not told that the Secretary of State himself drew this treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and I desire here to amplify what the Senator calls my attention to, and what his colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], has stated. No reason has been given, and I believe no reason can be given, why this was put in the form of a declaratory statement, or postscript to the treaty, instead of having it incorporated in the treaty itself. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated that the treaty itself was not signed when this declaratory statement was agreed to. He has gone further than that; he has stated upon the floor of the Senate that he and the others signed the declaratory statement before they signed the treaty itself.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet it was not considered desirable to incorporate it in the treaty, and now it is mysteriously dropped out of consideration of the Senate. I ask, Why was that barred from ratification? I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Japan is protected in what she wants by the additional treaty, which is supposed to be under consideration to-day, but we are not protected. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, and I challenge his denial, that the declaratory statement contains two parts—one desired by Japan and one desired by the United States. The part desired by the United States is in section 2; the part desired by Japan is in section 1.

Japan is protected by this supplemental agreement which we are considering to-day by the inclusion of the mandated islands. That is what Japan was demanding. The United States was demanding the exclusion of domestic questions; but those are not included in the supplementary treaty which we have up to-day. Why was Japan protected in this supplementary treaty, and why was the demand of the United States not included?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator want to put the mainland of Japan back into the four-power treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. That is all there is in the supplementary treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not the question. The question is as to the mandated islands. I am not referring to the mainland. This does not refer to the mainland. Here it is stated, evidently on the demand of Japan, that the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. LODGE. What is the Senator talking about now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am talking about this declaratory statement.

Mr. LODGE. The declaratory statement was made entirely by the United States, and was never suggested by anybody else. The first clause was intended to preserve our rights.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has discovered a wonderful amount of information. I have not been able to get out of him heretofore very much information about this treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That is not my fault.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated it was negotiated by the American Secretary of State, and that he was not present at the negotiations. I repeat, in section 1 Japan evidently has secured the inclusion of the mandated islands in her possession. In section 2 the United States secured the statement that domestic questions should be excluded from jurisdiction. You dropped out this declaratory statement, failed to ratify it, declare that it is not a part of the treaty, as the Senator from Massachusetts has done, and you have lost both the inclusion of the mandated islands and the exclusion of domestic questions. If that were all, that would be one thing; but in the supplemental treaty which you have up to-day you have included the mandated islands. So Japan has no complaint about this being left out. But in your supplemental statement you make no provision for the protection of the United States against the inclusion of domestic questions in controversy. That is my point.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know at all what the Senator is talking about. I do not know what he means.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Shall I repeat it?

Mr. LODGE. We recognized Japan's title to the mandated islands in the Yap treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my recollection is that we did not recognize anything in the Yap treaty.

Mr. LODGE. We recognized the title of Japan in the mandated islands in the first clause of the Yap treaty. I advise the Senator to read it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For some reason or other, Japan desired that her title in those islands should be recognized in this treaty and she got it specifically recognized, and we, as a consideration for that, in this declaratory statement got Japan to assent that domestic questions should not be within the realm of questions submitted to the four powers.

Mr. LODGE. Nothing of the sort. The two declaratory statements were made by me first when I presented the treaty. Both of them were the statements of the United States. The first one does not recognize the title of Japan in the mandated islands. It reserves to us the right to recognize it, which we subsequently did in our treaty about Yap. It is expressly stated in that treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It says here that the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is speaking of the supplementary treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am speaking about domestic questions.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator skips so rapidly from the declaration to the supplementary treaty that I am never quite sure what he is talking about.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is the declaratory statement I am talking about.

Mr. LODGE. I thought so. Then the Senator reads from the supplementary treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I am reading from the declaratory statement.

Mr. LODGE. Read the first one. It declares that we reserve our right to recognize the title of Japan in the mandated islands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean. I think perhaps the Senator is thinking about the proviso which follows, protecting the rights of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. I see what the Senator means. He leaves out the proviso.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. That makes it different. It reads:

Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What does that mean?

Mr. LODGE. Is that not clear?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is provided here that the mandated islands are included in the possessions of Japan, and yet that the United States does not consent to the mandates.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; unless she makes a separate treaty, which she has done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But it does make the treaty apply to the mandated islands.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; if the United States assents, it does.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States has assented.

Mr. LENROOT. But not to the title of Japan in the mandated islands.

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is nothing to the contrary.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, at the time this treaty and this declaratory statement were drawn the Yap treaty had not been ratified. Evidently, article 1 of this treaty was put in so that if the Yap treaty were defeated, Japan would still have a chance for protection.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it requires the ingenuity of the Senator from Nevada to find that. There is nothing of the sort.

Mr. PITTMAN. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the Yap treaty was ratified by this body after this was drawn, and Japan not only got her rights recognized in the Yap treaty but got us to recognize the mandates. Consequently, before we acted on the four-power pact Japan had gotten more than she asked in article 1.

Mr. LODGE. Is the Senator under the impression that the only mandated islands in the Pacific are those belonging to Japan?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; not at all; but I am talking about article 1——

Mr. LODGE. The object was to make the provisions of the treaty apply to the mandated islands, which are not supposed to be strictly covered by the words "insular possessions and insular dominions."

Mr. PITTMAN. But at the time you wrote this in, Japan had not had her rights to mandates in the Pacific islands recognized at all.

Mr. LODGE. Not by the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not by the United States.

Mr. LODGE. Nor had Great Britain. Great Britain has not had hers recognized yet.

Mr. PITTMAN. In the event the Yap treaty were defeated, then Japan could fall back upon this article 1 in the declaratory statement, which says that the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean; but the Yap treaty having been ratified before we acted upon this——

Mr. LODGE. No one except Senators who are opposed to all these treaties would think of reading that without the proviso.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; now you have granted them the proviso; now you have eliminated the proviso of the Yap treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; so far as Japan is concerned; but we have not eliminated it so far as the others are concerned.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are talking about the benefit Japan was assured in this declaratory statement. She got everything that was assured to her in this declaratory statement before this came up for consideration, and having gotten that, she was not interested in it. The United States alone was interested in protecting her domestic questions. For instance, this morning the Senator from Washington asked whether or not the question of our trade with the Philippines was a domestic question.

Mr. LODGE. No; he did not ask that.

Mr. PITTMAN. As to whether or not that could be involved in this conference.

Mr. LODGE. That is not what he asked.

Mr. PITTMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. LODGE. He asked whether we had a right to pass coastwise laws for the Philippine Islands.

Mr. PITTMAN. Put it in any manner you want; it means the same thing. The inquiry was as to whether or not the four powers to this treaty could raise a question as to a discrimination in favor of our citizens in trading with the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. Of course they could not.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand, and the Senator said that, but the distinguished Senator from Washington, who is just a little bit less intelligent than the Senator from Massachusetts, was not certain about it.

Mr. LODGE. No; he wanted me to make the statement publicly, that is all. He agrees with me entirely.

Mr. PITTMAN. Am I to understand, then, that any public statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts binds the United States Government and the other three powers?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all; no more than would the statement of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have heard to-day much about the Senator admitting this and the Senator conceding that, and that he gives notice of this and that, when the Senator knows that this Government can not be bound by a treaty or any form of agreement with another nation unless the particular agreement is ratified by two-thirds of this body. There was not a statement in the four-power pact, before it was ratified by this body, which had any effect whatever, not the slightest, and yet the Senator wants a part of it to have effect without being ratified.

Mr. LODGE. I deny that it is a part of it, and I do not think it would alter this situation if it were.

Mr. PITTMAN. If it is not a part of it, then we have no protection for our domestic rights.

Mr. LODGE. The domestic rights are not included in any way in the four-power treaty, and if this declaration did not exist they could not be brought under it.

Mr. PITTMAN. That question arose during the consideration of the Versailles treaty, and the Senator was doubtful at that time as to whether the question of our domestic rights was involved in the Versailles treaty, and he was so doubtful that he offered the long reservation which I submitted yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly I did, and I think there was reason for it. There was cause for doubt.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; the Senator wanted to be perfectly cautious, and nobody criticized the Senator's caution, but to-day he is entirely uncautious, because he is dealing with another crowd. That is the only distinction. If this is a hard-and-fast alliance that you can trust, the less you put into it the better. If it is not an alliance, all right. If a question arises with regard to coastwise trade in the Philippine Islands, and Japan objects to it on the ground that it is a discrimination and threatens war with Japan, what are you going to do about it? Is it going to be referred to the four powers as a controversy between some of them threatening war?

Mr. LODGE. Of course not; never in the world. There is nothing in the treaty to suggest it, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. And if an immigration question comes up between Japan and the United States that threatens war, is it going to be considered by the four powers?

Mr. LODGE. Why, of course not. There is nothing in the treaty at all that can be tortured into that construction.

Mr. PITTMAN. If a question comes up about the prohibition of Japanese subjects becoming citizens of the United States and that threatens war, is it going to be considered by the four powers?

Mr. LODGE. Of course not. The treaty has nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. PITTMAN. What causes are there that threaten war between the United States and Japan which are to be relieved by the four-power pact?

Mr. LODGE. I think we have gotten rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. That was the purpose of the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. But we had no threats of war except those I have mentioned, and the Senator has said those have nothing to do with the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator would like to have continued the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and so voted; therefore he does not apprehend anything from it. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under their treaty would the English join with the Japanese in a fight against the United States on account of any of our domestic questions?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think they would; but that is not the point.

Mr. PITTMAN. I still can not see how the four-power pact releases us from any threats of war because of the reasons I have stated.

Mr. LODGE. I think it does. I think it is a pretty good thing to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and the treaty terminates it.

Mr. PITTMAN. But now the only references to domestic questions that were in this treaty have been absolutely eliminated from the treaty, if they ever were there. I contend it does not make any difference in a contract whether it is written on one sheet of paper or twenty. The fact is, if it relates to the same subject and is interlined and governs the execution of both instruments, it is a part of the agreement, and it does not have to be on one sheet of paper. As a matter of fact, article 1 of what you call the declaratory statement, which was signed by all the powers that signed the treaty, limits article 2 and defines article 2. It is a part of article 2. It says expressly as to article 2, "That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace" certain questions. That is a limitation on article 1 of the four-power pact. Is it possible that a limitation signed contemporaneously with a contract does not become a part of it?

Mr. LODGE. It is a part of it if it is ratified.

Mr. PITTMAN. If it is a part of that contract——

Mr. LODGE. If it is not a part of it, the Senator can have it ratified if he wants to.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is one of the very remarkable expressions made by the Senator from Wisconsin, of course, and I would suggest possibly that you get something different there.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator disagree with that?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that the Senator from Nevada consult some of the lawyers upon his side of the Chamber.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no intention of being disrespectful, but I think it would be a good thing for the Senator from Wisconsin himself if this body would disbar him as a lawyer here and let him keep his seat as a Senator. Then he would have the same excuse the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has with regard to these inconsistencies. I was addressing the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, however.

If this statement was there as a part of the treaty——

Mr. LODGE. It was not.

Mr. PITTMAN. All right. I am taking the two sides of it. If it was drawn as a part of the treaty, which is a contract, it is not now a part anyway, because it ceases to be a contract unless voted for by two-thirds of the Senate, and it never was.

Mr. LODGE. Then it is not a part of the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Whether it was drawn as a part of the contract or not drawn as a part of the contract, it is not now a part of the contract, because no contract is binding on this Government until ratified.

Mr. LODGE. It is either a part of the treaty or it is not.

Mr. PITTMAN. We are agreed on that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator takes the ground that it was a part of the treaty and is not now a part of the treaty. Of course, his position is perfectly clear.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no doubt that it is not now a part of the contract.

Mr. LODGE. And it never was.

Mr. PITTMAN. As to whether it was is another question, but the absurd statement of the distinguished constitutional lawyer from Wisconsin that it is not a part of the treaty, yet if it was a part of the treaty it has been ratified, because the Senate ratified some other things, hardly requires comment. We have ratified this treaty section by section, article by article, by a two-thirds vote. Even the Senator from Wisconsin, I think, recognizes that the two-thirds vote was necessary to ratify article 2, and he voted for it.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not think so; not when we were voting article by article, and neither does the Senator from Nevada, if he knows anything about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, when it was reported to the Senate. Under the Constitution and rules of this body the action of the Committee of the Whole is to be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Not under the Constitution, but under the rules of this body.

Mr. PITTMAN. When the Constitution authorizes a rule it is then under the Constitution. Of course, the Senator does not know that, but that is the fact. Under the rules of the Senate, which are authorized by the Constitution and therefore are constitutional, whenever the Committee of the Whole has agreed on a certain contract, that is reported to the Senate, and the Senate acts on it. The Senate did act on it, and the Senate was informed that the Committee of the Whole, by a two-thirds vote, had adopted articles 1, 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. LODGE. No; none of the articles were adopted by anything but a majority. Let the Senator study the rules.

Mr. PITTMAN. By a majority. If I said two-thirds——

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; he did say two-thirds.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I withdraw it and make it a majority, so the Senator will be satisfied. But it was reported that the Committee of the Whole had adopted it, and their action was the adoption of articles 1, 2, 3, and 4. That was the report. There was not any report whatever that they had adopted this other statement. In fact, when inquiry was made it was distinctly said that it had not been and would not be ratified. Therefore, whether it was originally intended to be or not, it was eliminated before the resolution of ratification was voted on, and therefore the resolution of ratification could not apply to it in any circumstances whatever.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Nevada evidently was out of the Chamber when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who, I think the Senator from Nevada will admit, has some legal ability, concurred with me in every statement that I had made with respect to the binding effect of the action taken by the Senate, and that we could violate every rule of the Senate and it would not have the slightest effect upon the validity of the final action taken.

Mr. PITTMAN. When I was practicing law in Nome, Alaska, we had two law books up there——

Mr. LENROOT. That perhaps accounts for the Senator's legal ability.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, well, I have a high regard for the Senator from Arkansas, and, in fact, I realize he is far superior to the Senator and myself in legal knowledge; but when I was in Alaska with those two books I remember a very distinguished lawyer got up before the court one time and went to quoting from a very distinguished author on mines, Mr. Lindley. He quoted very fluently from Mr. Lindley on mines. It made no more impression upon the court than many statements made on the floor of the Senate very frequently. The court simply remarked that he would prefer to read the language of Judge Lindley than to have it quoted from memory.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I was rather surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts, in attempting to give the reasons why the four-power pact was proposed and agreed to, should abandon one after the other the possible causes and finally attribute the desire to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance as the real cause for agreeing to this pact. It is pretty notorious by this time that the Anglo-Japanese alliance is not at this time and had never been a menace to the United States. At the present time there are at least three reasons why it is not a menace to the United States:

First, it contains a provision that it shall not apply to the United States.

Second, the public opinion of Great Britain would never tolerate its application in the case of war between the United States and Japan. It would disrupt the British Empire to do it.

In the third place, under the covenant of the League of Nations the Anglo-Japanese alliance as it existed was outlawed, and Japan and Great Britain jointly signed a statement made to the League of Nations authorities admitting that it could not be longer continued in effect and must be revised.

There are three distinct reasons at least why that bugaboo could not be held up as a reason for the United States making any sacrifices to form the four-power pact.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I have listened to the Senator very carefully. He deserves a great deal of credit for showing to the Senate and to the country the condition in which we have been put by the action of the Senate yesterday. We have had a resolution of ratification of the four-power treaty. Nothing has been done about the supplemental declaratory statement additional to that in article 2, which was intended to eliminate from all the conferences that might be held under the four-power treaty the question of immigration, the condition of Japanese in California, and to leave those matters entirely eliminated from such conferences.

By our action of yesterday we are put in a very embarrassing situation. I do not know whether it was done intentionally or whether it was done through oversight. We have ratified a treaty in which nothing has been done in connection with the conferences of the four powers being debarred from consideration of our domestic questions of immigration and the treatment of Japanese in the United States.

That having been eliminated and the provision protecting the United States in article 2 of the declaratory statement not having been acted upon, and the Senator from Massachusetts now saying it is not a part of the treaty, consequently Japan can ratify our action of yesterday, and that matter would entirely be eliminated. We would have nothing but the declaration of her minister here, which could be repudiated by the Japanese Government, which could at any time be changed, and not a solemn treaty of 10 years' duration, as the other compact is.

If we should ratify by a separate resolution of ratification, as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, what is the condition? We then have the four-power treaty, in which Japan is interested, which she can ratify, and then we have the declaratory statement which we have ratified in a separate resolution, which she could fail to ratify. Then we are put in the attitude of leaving the question unsettled as to what power shall exist or shall be vested in the four-power conference.

The only bone of contention between Japan and this country, the only possibility of trouble, being the question of immigration and the treatment of Japanese desirous of becoming citizens of this country, the Japanese Government claiming the right still to interfere here and say what kind of treatment shall be accorded them, it seems to me that some provision should have been included in a distinct treaty and resolution of ratification so that there could be no further differences between the Japanese Government and this Government upon those questions. If we had one resolution of ratification ratifying the four-power treaty and the supplemental declaratory statement to it, it would all have been included, and Japan would have to accept both or none. But now we put ourselves in the attitude of allowing Japan to ratify the one and reject the other.

I do not know whether that was done intentionally or whether it was an oversight. If it was an oversight, the proper course to pursue is to move to reconsider, within the three days, the resolution of ratification of yesterday and let that resolution of ratification be amended to include both. That is the only way this Government can get a guaranty that Japan shall acquiesce in our contention as to immigration, and that when her people become citizens of this country they are subject to our domestic laws. It seems to me we are now in such a position that Japan can get what she desires under the four-power treaty and refuse to ratify the other portion of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President; I have already called attention to that matter, which the Senator from Virginia has much more completely covered. A serious question is presented. The subject of immigration is of far more importance in a treaty with Japan than in a treaty with any other country. It is the only big question at issue between the United States and Japan. It does not involve simply the States up and down the Pacific coast, but, in a large degree, it involves the Hawaiian Islands. In those islands there is a mixed population. More than half of that population to-day is Japanese. The Japanese have acquired rights there; they have married there; children have been born unto them, and a considerable proportion of the population of the Hawaiian Islands to-day is Japanese by descent but American by birth.

It is almost inevitable that in the Hawaiian Islands there will develop sooner or later a very acute form of race question. When that develops, the door has been left open for Japan to claim under the provisions of this treaty that the question involved is one affecting her rights and the rights of her nationals in the Pacific islands under article 1 of the treaty. We have virtually abandoned, as I see it, section 2 of the declaratory reservation. The Senator from Massachusetts has specifically said that the following provision is not a part of the treaty:

> 2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Not only the Senator from Massachusetts says that is not a part of the treaty, but the action of the Senate makes it not a part of the treaty. It could have been made a part of the treaty; that could have been done on yesterday; it may be done, I presume, under a reconsideration, as the Senator from Virginia suggests, within three days; but if it is not done, the United States abandons the position which it has the opportunity to maintain, that the question of immigration is not within the jurisdiction of the four powers.

Mr. President, I have occupied the floor much longer than I intended to, though I have not done so very much speaking myself.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. I conclude from the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that he is of the opinion that what is called the declaratory statement is and ought to be considered a part of the treaty itself and ought to have been read and acted upon by the Senate precisely as the other articles of the treaty were?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Exactly.

Mr. SPENCER. I wonder if the Senator has thought of this view of the case: When that treaty was signed, it was signed by 19 plenipotentiaries who acted for the President of the United States, for His Majesty the King of Great Britain, for the President of France, and for the Emperor of Japan. They were acting as plenipotentiaries. When they signed in that capacity, they signed officially, and the Senator from Nebraska will find on looking at the treaty that each affixed his individual seal. They were acting in an official capacity and formulated a treaty.

When that treaty was signed and completed with such formality the same 19 men as individuals, not as plenipotentiaries, not even indicating that they were acting, as they did in signing the treaty, by the authority of their Government, but acting as individuals and without seal, without the formalities of execution, expressed their interpretation of what their respective Governments meant by that treaty. Is there not a distinct difference? One is an official treaty; the other is the declaration of the same men, but not acting officially, as to what that treaty meant. One is binding; the other is indicative. If that is correct, the declaratory statement never could be ratified by the Senate. It does not possess the indicia of a treaty; it is an expression of individual opinion. We could approve it; we could say it represents what we believe; but we could not ratify it with the formalities with which a treaty under our Constitution must be ratified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, there are just two answers to the position taken by the Senator from Missouri. The first answer is that the Senate has in the past ratified treaties to which the representatives of the respective Governments have not affixed their official seal. One case to which I can cite the Senator is the treaty with Portugal for the extradition of criminals. After the treaty had been drawn and had been signed by Elihu Root and Alte with legal seals, Alte wrote a letter to Mr. Elihu Root without an official seal and Elihu Root answered it without an official seal, and agreed to the proposition, and the Senate of the United States ratified that agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One moment. There is a second answer to the Senator's position. If there was the intention to make the declaratory statement any less binding than the treaty itself, it was a very deplorable thing to do. It was agreed to before the treaty was signed. The treaty could have been rewritten, it consists of only four paragraphs, and its framers could have embodied the declaratory statement in the treaty as of equal dignity. If our representatives placed our reservation of the question of immigration upon so flimsy a foundation as the Senator indicates, they did something which was outrageous; but I can not put that interpretation upon their action. I yield now to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the declarations bear upon their face the evidence that contradicts the contention of the Senator from Missouri, when he claims that the declarations were the individual acts of the plenipotentiaries and not the acts of the Governments which they represented.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a third answer to the position of the Senator from Missouri. I had omitted that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The language employed is very clear and shows that they were acting in their official capacity and acting for their Governments. It reads:

> In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan, it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not "the understanding and intent" of the individual delegates to the conference; not of the "plenipotentiaries" of the signatory powers, but of the "signatory powers." It is declared to be "the understanding and intent of the signatory powers," and hence the signers must have been acting in their official capacity whether they used a seal or did not use a seal.

Mr. SPENCER. When they used the language "in signing the treaty this day," to what did they refer?

Mr. SIMMONS. They referred to the treaty itself.

Mr. SPENCER. That is as a completed document?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Outside of the declaratory statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. But they declared that the understanding and the intent which is set forth in this declaration is the understanding and intent of the signatory powers.

Mr. SPENCER. Then the Senator will agree with me that the treaty was intact and complete in itself, and that the declaratory statement was an expression of their understanding as to what that treaty meant?

Mr. SIMMONS. I take it as a matter of fact that they were contemporaneous documents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Senator from Massachusetts has already stated that the declaratory statement was signed first; so there would have been time to rewrite the treaty to embody the statement in the treaty as should have been done. The form, however, is not unusual. A number of cases may be cited where, after a treaty had been duly drawn and even before it was signed, an additional article was written and signed by the same men on the same day, sometimes modifying and sometimes merely explaining an ambiguity in the treaty; but in every such case which I have found that additional article has been ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, has not the Senator found in every case that there was a reference in the explanatory or additional statement which expressly stated it was to be a part of the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have already stated to the Senator that I consider it utterly unimportant whether it is itself a part of the treaty or whether the law makes it a part of the treaty. A treaty is a contract, and the Senator, as a lawyer, knows that a writing signed by the same person at the same time relating to the same matter becomes a part of the contract.

Mr. SPENCER. There must be one other element, namely, the persons must act in precisely the same capacity at both times. Then it does become a part of the contract, but not without that essential.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. These men had no right to act in any other capacity than as representatives of sovereign powers, and they acted in that capacity; they represented sovereign powers.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. What is the construction of the word "supplementary" in connection with a book or a paper or a treaty?

Mr. SPENCER. I should say that it implied something added to the original, but I do not find the word "supplementary" in the declaratory statement, which is now being discussed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The word "supplementary" is used; here it is.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not find it in the declaratory statement.

Mr. LODGE. That word is in the supplementary treaty, but not in the declaration to the four-power treaty.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Georgia is evidently referring to the supplementary treaty which is now before the Senate, while we are discussing the declaratory statement appended to the treaty which was ratified yesterday. The word "supplementary" does not occur at all in connection with the question we are now discussing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, mere quibbling with words, it seems to me, is not of any importance. The declaration was signed at the same time the treaty was signed, or even a little before. It reads:

In signing the treaty this day—

Is not that the same as saying "in signing the present treaty"? Does not the Senator think that is what it means?

Mr. SPENCER. I should not think it meant quite that. I should think that the clear meaning of those words was that the 19 delegates, referring to a treaty which they had officially completed, gave their individual opinion as to what the signatory powers meant by the treaty to which they had officially agreed. That is the way I should read it. I do not see how it can be read otherwise.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what it was; it was an addition to the treaty, a change in the treaty, designed to remove an ambiguity in the treaty.

Mr. SPENCER. If it had meant——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I shall refer now for the record to a number of treaties embodying additional paragraphs or declarations which have uniformly in the past been ratified by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska that if it had meant what he evidently thinks it means, how simple it would have been to have said, "As a part of the treaty signed this day"? That is what was done, in effect. I venture to say, in the case of every one of the illustrations the benefit of which the Senator from Nebraska is now about to give us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will not stop to examine as to that, but I will put the documents in the record, and I will ask any Senator on the other side when he comes to speak on this question to put into the record a reference to any treaty which contains such a supplemental or additional declaration which the Senate of the United States failed to ratify.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. It has appeared from the discussion that the so-called declaratory statement was signed before the treaty was signed. It was at first thought by the President of the United States that there was no guaranty of the territorial integrity of the main islands of Japan. The whole country was aroused over that question, and the attention of the whole country was focused on this supplementary statement at the time it was made. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri why he supposes——

Mr. KING. He has gone.

Mr. STANLEY. While I was asking him, he departed. If the seals are so important, and in one case they acted officially, as contended by the Senator from Missouri, and in the other case it was simply a statement of plenipotentiaries, without any binding force upon their Governments, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts why in one case they signed with their seals and in the other they did not? What was the reason for it?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question? Does not the situation on the other side of the Chamber remind him of the story about the boy who "stood on the burning deck, whence all but him had fled"?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not know which is in the worse fix—the deck or the boy.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think the deck is in the worse fix.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I shall not conclude tonight by putting in these references until I can supplement them somewhat. As another Senator desires the floor, I yield it.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I addressed the Senate on the 15th instant in support of the four-power treaty, and stated at the time it was my opinion that the treaty for reduction of naval armament and the treaty concerning the principles and policies to be followed in relation to China should stand or fall with it.

I shall now discuss the naval disarmament treaty, and shall devote the major portion of my time to the relation of this treaty to the upbuilding of an effective American merchant marine.

The treaty on reduction of naval armaments provides that the United States and Great Britain shall be on equal terms of five to five as to the size and relative strength of their capital ships, Japan being on the ratio of three to five. I am very much pleased at the terms of this treaty, the spirit and intent of which is to make America the equal of Great Britain in its naval strength, neither country being expected to enjoy any superiority over the other in so far as its power on the sea is concerned. As I understand the situation, that was the plain intention and desire of the American delegates who framed the treaty, and I believe that the people of America so understand it. From now on we should have a Navy just as great and strong as that of Great Britain, who for so many years has been the mistress of the seas.

MERCHANT SHIPS VITAL TO NAVY.

There is only one way, however, for this expectation of equality to be realized, and that is for America to make very material additions to its commercial fleet. It is well understood that swift vessels of commerce, carrying both freight and passengers, and having a speed in excess of 15 knots—preferably 20 knots and over—can be and are utilized very effectively as auxiliaries to the Navy in time of war. These swift vessels, having a tonnage of ten to fifteen thousand and over, prepared to handle passengers as well as freight, and to perform both general and special service on the sea, are complements and essential parts of a complete and perfect navy.

Great Britain is well supplied with vessels of this character. She has a total of 146 ships of the combined passenger and cargo type of 10,000 gross tons and over, aggregating 1,870,147 tons, with a speed of 12 to 20 knots and over, while the United States has only 44 such vessels, with an aggregate of 638,247 tons. In other words, Great Britain has nearly three times as many ships which are susceptible of being used as naval auxiliaries as the United States.

If the commercial marine of the United States is to remain at its present level so far as these fast ships are concerned, then Great Britain, with her large fleet of potential naval auxiliaries, would beyond question continue, as she is to-day, very much more powerful on the sea, even though our naval vessels—our fighting ships—are her equals on a tonnage basis.

PAST EXPERIENCE SOUNDS WARNING.

How shall this inequality be overcome? Vessels other than the fighting fleet which would be needed by the Navy in time of war, and which would largely be drawn from the merchant marine, include scouts, colliers, ammunition ships, supply and refrigerating ships, distilling ships, tankers, hospital ships, repair ships, dispatch vessels, mine sweepers, mine layers, aircraft carriers, aircraft tenders, submarine tenders, destroyer tenders, gunboats, and yachts. Similarly, in any military enterprise involving the movement of troops overseas, the matter of first and paramount importance is the sufficiency, suitability, and readiness of transports for troops and for supplies. These necessities involve not only problems of material, but also—and perhaps of even greater importance—of personnel. Our experience during the Spanish War and the situation that confronted us when we entered the World War should be convincing evidence of the necessity of an adequate merchant marine as a matter of national defense.

In the Spanish War, for the transportation of the Santiago expedition in 1898, the Quartermaster's Department chartered every American vessel that could be obtained in Atlantic ports during the 20 days following the declaration of war and succeeded in obtaining a fleet of only 36 vessels, averaging 2,500 gross tons, and only 2 of these were as large as 4,000 tons. These ships had an aggregate capacity of 90,000 gross tons, or less than one-half the quantity required at that time to embark a force of two divisions. The Navy was able to obtain 103 auxiliary vessels during the Spanish War, all but 6 of which were purchased abroad, the majority of them coming from Great Britain.

LACK OF TROOPSHIPS A MENACE.

At the outbreak of the World War the lack of an American merchant marine and the consequent lack of a trained seagoing personnel were immediately felt. The United States Shipping Board was established to undertake the vast task of creating a merchant marine, and one of the most difficult phases of the problem was to obtain an adequate trained personnel to man the merchant fleet. During the war the number of privately owned vessels purchased and chartered by the Navy was 1,677. When we entered the conflict our Army transport service consisted of only 7 vessels under the control of the War Department, and on July 1, 1917, there were in service 7 troopships of 46,000 dead-weight tons and 6 cargo ships of 48,000 dead-weight tons. This number was later increased to 512 vessels having a dead-weight tonnage of 3,251,000, not including a cross-channel fleet of 104 lake vessels, with a tonnage of 311,000. These figures include 460,000 dead-weight tons of seized German vessels and 300,000 dead-weight tons of Dutch vessels. Our success in meeting the situation was due not only to these acquisitions of foreign tonnage but also to the cooperation of our allies; for of the total number of troops carried overseas, namely, 2,086,000, less than half, or 46 per cent, were carried in American vessels, and 54 per cent were carried in vessels flying foreign flags, of which 48 per cent were British vessels.

So much for the past. Any limitation through international agreement in the future construction of naval vessels will render the necessity of a merchant marine and its personnel of even greater importance than it has been in the past in determining naval and military effectiveness; and without an adequate merchant marine the safety of our country might easily be imperiled. We are on the most cordial terms with Great Britain, Japan, and other sea powers to-day, and it is my sincere hope that this friendly relationship and cooperation will continue with all the world. But one can not foresee what will happen in the future; and while wars are universally abhorred, there is no assurance that they will not recur at times and in regions that can not be predicted very far in advance. If such a breach in our international relations should occur, we would need a very large number of naval auxiliaries and a large number of supply vessels to serve our fleet. There would be no time to build these vessels after diplomatic relations were broken; it would not be safe to trust to the chance of being able to purchase or charter foreign-flag merchant vessels; and the only course open from the standpoint of national safety is to have these vessels form a part of our permanent merchant marine.

RELIEF OFFERED BY LEGISLATION.

It would seem that the mere statement of the case is sufficient, and no argument is necessary to prove the extreme desirability and necessity of such a commercial fleet as I have described—not, perhaps, as great a merchant marine as that of Great Britain, but certainly one of sufficient size and so adjusted and balanced as to furnish all necessary naval auxiliaries.

In order to insure such a marine, there must be very material changes in our legislation. President Harding, in his recent message on shipping, suggested a number of measures of relief which are embodied in a bill introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on the 23d of last month.

I shall discuss several phases of this bill, and earnestly commend its most careful consideration.

The bill first proposes to allow the Shipping Board to create out of the sale of its assets, at the world's market prices, a fund of $125,000,000 within the shortest period possible, and to loan this money to American shipbuilders at not less than 2 per cent interest. This feature is calculated to be of inestimable value in encouraging the construction of the higher type of vessel suitable for naval auxiliaries of which we are so sorely in need. Such a procedure was followed by Great Britain when in 1902 it loaned to the Cunard Line twelve and a half millions at 2½ per cent for the construction of the Lusitania and Mauretania. Besides this loan Britain agreed to pay to this company a fixed subsidy of £150,000—$750,000—a year in lieu of the previous Admiralty subvention of £15,000—$75,000. In a nutshell, the increased subsidy not only provided the interest on the twelve million five hundred thousand but amortized it in about 30 years, the life of a ship.

The interest amounts to $312,000 per year. The increased subsidy of $675,000 not only covers the interest but gives them $362,000 a year more. That $362,000 a year would in about 30 to 35 years pay the twelve and a half million. In other words, this was not a mere loan but a gift. So that Great Britain practically made a gift of the two finest passenger ships of the day to the Cunard Line in order to build up the British merchant marines.

TO STIMULATE SHIPBUILDING.

The Shipping Board already has authority to create this $125,000,000 construction loan fund from the sale of its assets, but at the present time it can be loaned to shipbuilders only at the rate of $25,000,000 a year. It is sought to expedite the realization of this fund, so that a greater amount may be made available immediately for the American shipowners in giving work to American shipyards at this particular time when it is so badly needed. This is a revolving loan fund. It is not a payment outright. Sums lent will bear interest and return that interest to the Public Treasury. It is not a subsidy; it is a business loan, the Government being protected by a first mortgage all along. It is the kind of indirect aid which a great many of the maritime nations of the world have given to their merchant marines.

The next provision is that 5 per cent of all freight moneys shall be deductible from income and corporation taxes if such freight moneys have been paid, inbound or outbound, to American ships. This provision is proposed in lieu of the benefits which were to have accrued to American shippers from section 34 of the Jones Act, which, in effect, as we all know, allowed preferential tariffs or discriminating duties on goods shipped in American vessels. President Harding, concurring with President Wilson, does not consider it in the national interest to abrogate the treaties existing with other nations which prohibit the imposition of discriminating duties. As the proposed substitute would apply both to exports and imports, I feel that it would be potentially of as great value as the discriminating duties of the old American practice, and of the provisions of section 34 of the merchant marine act of 1920. Its benefits will flow to every shipper in the United States; to the farmer, the miner, the manufacturer, the merchant, the importer and exporter. We will all be aided by it and at the same time it will aid our shipping.

FAIR SHARE OF IMMIGRATION SOUGHT.

Still another form of indirect aid very wisely proposed is a provision that at least 50 per cent of the immigrants that enter our country shall come in American ships. There is nothing difficult or complex about this proposal. Prior to the World War the European steamship companies that conveyed virtually all of our trans-Atlantic trade had a working agreement among themselves by which the immigrants were portioned out—such a per cent to the British lines, such a per cent to the German lines, and so on, with a negligible remnant to American vessels. Had such a provision as this been on the statute books in 1907, when our country reached the peak of immigration of 1,200,000 people per year, our own steamship companies would have been receiving most of the very substantial sums that poured into the coffers of foreign lines through this trade, and we would not have been in such sad need of passenger ships when the war broke upon us in 1914.

The measure further proposes to create a merchant marine naval reserve, to consist of persons who are employed for a major portion of their time on merchant vessels, or who by appointment or enlistment obligate themselves to serve on merchant vessels in time of national emergency. The purpose of this provision is to insure a well-trained 100 per cent American crew for every vessel pressed into Government service in time of national emergency. This reserve, it is estimated, will cost about $650,000 the first year, and will reach a maximum of $3,000,000. This sum contemplates a reserve of about 5,000 officers and 30,000 men. I have already pointed out the difficulty we experienced in manning our merchant marine during the recent war. I merely wish to state further in this connection that it was often necessary to stop our ships at sea in the war zone to take off men who were friends of our enemies and hostile to our cause. In fact, at least 30,000 men were removed from our ships during this period. In view of our past experiences I believe that all will admit the necessity for such an organization as is provided for in this bill.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD USE AMERICAN SHIPS.

Still another effective form of indirect aid is the proposed requirement that American officials traveling on Government lines at Government expense must travel on American ships wherever these are available.

Another indirect aid on which we will all find it easy to agree is to discontinue so far as practicable the expensive Government transport services of the Navy and Army, and make our cargo-passenger ships the agencies of such communication, as do all other maritime nations of the world. Such a provision should increase the net earnings to those private owners engaging in such trade, and be an impelling inducement to private owners to purchase at a fair valuation the Shipping Board passenger-cargo vessels adapted for this service.

And, finally, the bill provides direct aid to our shipowners to enable them to compete with the shipowners of other countries having wage and building costs far below our standards. The expense of this subsidy is estimated at $15,000,000 the first year, and $30,000,000 at the end of five years, which will be about the maximum. I will not go into the details of the formula, which was worked out with a view to building up a well-balanced merchant marine of the types of ships needed to cover the routes and the trades that meet our purposes. Stated in simple terms, it amounts to one-half cent per gross ton for each 100 miles steamed in the foreign trade plus an additional amount for high speeds. For speeds up to 13 knots on light draft the rate of one-half cent per ton per 100 miles is constant. Beginning with 13 knots, the rate increases rapidly, thus placing a premium upon speed.

The reason for adopting this premium is to encourage the building and operating of high-speed vessels suitable for carrying the mails and for use as naval auxiliaries, and to compensate for the increased cost of construction and operation. The board is authorized to increase the amount of compensation up to twice the amount provided for in the bill when necessary to induce the establishment and maintenance of lines, and to reduce such compensation when the amount under special circumstances is excessive. Fast vessels receiving the subsidy must carry our foreign mails when required, for which no payment will be made to them, but the proper credit for the service rendered will be made by the Post Office Department to the Shipping Board. This amount expended for carriage of foreign mails is estimated at about $5,000,000 per annum.

PROFITEERING GUARDED AGAINST.

If the owner of a vessel during any fiscal year receives a net return of more than 10 per cent he is required to pay the Shipping Board 50 per cent of such earnings in excess of 10 per cent until the amount of compensation received under the act is returned. The provision is a safeguard against any profiteering at the Government's expense.

There are a number of other minor provisions in the bill which I do not consider necessary to discuss.

This bill deals with American shipping as Congress finds it to-day, not with American shipping as it might have been or as many of us would like to have it. It recognizes that the laws enacted to meet the demands of labor for superior living and working conditions on American ships are on the statute books to stay. Therefore, provision is attempted to be made whereby the Government is to assume such additional burdens as its legislation imposes. Furthermore, it recognizes the fact that it is more expensive for us to break into the commercial fields now fully occupied by our competitors than it is for us to remain in those fields after they have once been acquired. Japan clearly recognized this fact, and therefore, despite its cheap labor, provided through the Japanese act of 1896 for Government bounties to aid in the construction and operation of Japanese ships. This should be sufficient demonstration for us.

It should not be overlooked that it is not because we have no foreign commerce at the present time that our ships designed for the foreign carrying trade are idle. The Government reports for the year ended October 31, 1921, show that shipping to the amount of 127,301,777 net tons engaged in foreign trade entered and left our ports, and that cargoes in this trade to the amount of 85,035,851 tons were brought in or carried away. This vast amount of freight is nearly twice the amount which would be required to give employment to all existing American vessels suitable for the foreign trade, and therefore primarily the question is how to enable American ships to secure their share of this vast amount of traffic.

FOR A 100 PER CENT AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

All the provisions of this bill are important, and each is calculated to be helpful in reaching the desired end—a real 100 per cent American merchant marine. The indirect aids are carefully prepared and well planned for effectiveness, and I believe are certain of acceptance substantially in their present form by the Senate and House of Representatives.

I wish to present somewhat in detail, however, the arguments in favor of the direct aid provided in the bill, which is commonly referred to as a subsidy, and without which the encouragement provided by the indirect aids would not suffice to set our merchant flag again upon the ocean. It must be remembered that for 60 years and more foreign shipowners have been in command of the situation. They hold to-day the mastery of most of the great routes of ocean commerce. They have their agencies, their representatives, their established interests and communications all over the world. They are determined to maintain their mastery and to drive off our American ships and to dominate our ocean-carrying trade, because they well know its advantages to their own manufacturers and merchants. These foreigners are resolved that the United States shall not become an independent maritime nation, with ships capable of serving its own people in foreign commerce and possessed of an adequate naval reserve. They are quite willing that we should go on doing as we have in the past, paying tribute to the shipping of their nations and enabling them to build up their commerce and their merchant marines at our expense.

The President, appealing in his merchant-marine message to all the people of the United States, declares that those who oppose this policy "ought in all fairness to propose an acceptable alternative."

SUBSIDIES USED BY OUR COMPETITORS.

Whatever our prejudices may be against the word "subsidy" and the policy it stands for, is there any alternative? I know of none. The United States is the only maritime country in which the question of subsidy is ever debated. It is the only maritime country that has ever hesitated to employ a subsidy policy commensurate with its means and opportunities. Just before the late Great War the rest of the world was spending $50 annually in subsidies and bounties to shipping, where the United States, the wealthiest Nation in existence, was giving one, and that in mail pay to a few ocean services.

Every nation in the world that has a merchant marine worth considering has in some way or another included subsidy with other forms of national aid. This is the fully established practice of all of the sea-trading peoples. Would these shrewd commercial folk adopt and continue a subsidy system if it did not "produce results" commensurate with each nation's racial fitness and opportunities?

We must approach consideration of the subsidy problem in the fullest possible spirit of open-mindedness. Is it not quite possible that the other nations of the world in their attitude toward shipping subsidies have been right and that America has been wrong?

Let us look for a moment into the history of Government aid to the merchant marine. We all know that by common consent the American Congress in the very first law passed by the first Congress under the Constitution—a law framed by the founders of the Republic, by Washington, Adams, Madison, and Jefferson—provided the protection of discriminating or preferential duties for the young American merchant marine. We all know that under that policy in a few years, instead of carrying 23 per cent of our imports under our own flag, as in 1789, we were carrying 85 and 90 per cent in our own vessels, and that the tonnage of our overseas shipping rose with an unexampled swiftness from 123,000 in 1789 to 981,000 in 1810.

OUR ADVANTAGES THROWN AWAY.

Our achievement was so extraordinary, our confidence so strong, that in the years after the War of 1812 we allowed ourselves to be tied up in commercial treaties by the clever and far-seeing diplomats of Europe, so that the discriminating duties were finally, though not completely until 1850, abandoned by our Government. Looking back we can now see that we were outgeneraled and beaten.

And what did the governments of the Old World do when they had us thus bound hand and foot against renewal of the discriminating duties? These governments deliberately took up another policy, a very effective policy, of steamship subsidies and subventions, begun by Great Britain in a mail subsidy of $425,000 a year, which created the Cunard Line of trans-Atlantic steamers in the year 1839. Having called the Cunard Line into being, the British Government granted another subsidy of $1,300,000 a year to the Peninsular & Oriental Line to the East Indies, and still another subsidy of a like sum to the Royal Mail Steam Packet Co. for a steamship service under the British flag to the West Indies and the east coast of South America. Practically all of the British merchant steamship services were subsidized in those crucial years of the development of steamship building and steam machinery building. So that very soon Great Britain, which had been squarely beaten in sail craft, saw her hope to regain the mastery of the seas.

But the United States then was not blind and idle. Barred by the treaties from a readoption of discriminating duties, the American Government sought to meet British competition by initiating a vigorous mail-subsidy system of its own. This is the record of history, perhaps forgotten by some of us, but not forgotten by all of us.

SOUTHERNERS INITIATED SUBSIDY POLICY.

I would invite the attention of Senators to the recorded fact that these first and earliest of American steamship subsidies were given by southern lawmakers, acting on the recommendation of a Democratic President.

The honor of initiating this first American subsidy policy, which, while it was applied, proved splendidly successful, belongs to two southern Senators of distinguished reputation in their time—Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, and Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas. Only a year after the first British Cunard steamships had begun their regular trans-Atlantic service from Liverpool to Halifax and Boston Senator King began to advocate in Washington an annual appropriation of a million dollars for the carrying of the mails and the encouragement of American steamship building and navigation. Later Senator Rusk was an ardent advocate of the same policy. Senator King, for example, said:

It is sufficient to show that they (British statesmen) are resolved, as far as practicable, to monopolize the intercourse between these two important points. This movement shows clearly that the time has arrived when we must decide whether we will yield this essential branch of navigation and this indirect means of extending our naval armaments to our great commercial rival, or whether we shall promptly extend to our enterprising merchants the necessary means to enable them to bring American energy, enterprise, and skill into successful competition with British sagacity and capital. Of all the lines of sailing packets which cross the Atlantic, not one is owned in Europe; and it is not to be doubted that American merchants, properly encouraged, will assuredly excel in them (steamship lines) as they have done in sailing vessels; and when we reflect that this may be accomplished to the mutual advantage and advancement of our commercial and military marine, it would seem that no statesman ought to hesitate for a moment to give his support to a measure which is demanded alike by prudence and the necessities of our position.

These words found a patriotic response in the Congress. An act of Congress in 1845 authorized the Postmaster General to make contracts with American shipowners for the carriage of mails in American-built ships to Europe.

HOW DEMOCRACY AIDED SHIPPING.

President Polk, in a message to Congress, speaking of supplementary legislation, said:

The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication with the various distant parts of the world is established, by means of American-built steamers, would find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad; but the national advantage is still greater—of having our naval officers made familiar with steam navigation and of having the privilege of taking the ships already equipped for immediate service at a moment's notice, and will be cheaply purchased by the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mail, over and above the postage received. A just national pride, no less than our commercial interests, would seem to favor the policy of augmenting the number of this description of vessels.

These were days of strength and glory for the Democratic Party in the Nation. For the most of these years that party continued to control our national destinies. It was characterized in its foreign and domestic policies by the fervent patriotism of Andrew Jackson and of the great Democrats who came after him. Those statesmen saw nothing inconsistent between Democratic Party faith and national mail subsidies to American steamships, serving as these ships did as our indispensable naval reserve in time of war.

JEFFERSON'S WORDS RING TRUE TO-DAY.

The immortal founder of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson, had the American merchant marine in mind when in 1793 he wrote these remarkable words to the House of Representatives:

Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense essential. Its value as a branch of industry is enhanced by the dependence of so many other branches on it. In times of general peace it multiplies competitors for employment in transportation, and so keeps that at its proper level, and in times of war—that is to say, when those nations, who may be our principal carriers, shall be at war with each other—if we have not within ourselves the means of transportation, our produce must be exported in belligerent vessels, at the increased expense of war freight and insurance, and the articles which will not bear that must perish on our hands.

But it is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear on their land board, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on their seaboard they are open to injury, and they have there, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen and of artisans and establishments in readiness for shipbuilding.

No wiser words were ever uttered, and every one of them is applicable to-day.

EFFECT OF EARLY SUBSIDY.

Under our ocean mail law of 1845 and a later law of 1847 a subsidy of $200,000 a year for 20 voyages was provided for the Ocean Steamship Co. to maintain a line from New York to France and Germany. The first line of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was established on the Pacific coast, and another and connecting line was established by mail subsidy from New York to the Isthmus of Panama. Moreover, excellent, though smaller, services were put upon the seas from Charleston and New Orleans to the West Indies.

In 1847 a very important contract was concluded between the Postmaster General and the Collins Steamship Line for a service from New York to Liverpool, which was intended to be the most effective in the world. The first subsidy to that line was of $385,000 a year—a sum, it is to be remarked, much smaller than the $425,000 which Great Britain had paid for the establishment of the Cunard Line, with smaller and inferior steamers. Not only did the Collins company fulfill its contracts, but it even exceeded them by building steamships twice the size and of far greater speed than the Cunarders, the most powerful, swift, and efficient steamers in existence. Because of their extraordinary performances and of their higher cost Congress voluntarily increased the Collins subsidy to $858,000 a year. At that time, or soon after, the Cunard steamers, regularly beaten by the American, voyage after voyage, were receiving about $900,000 from the British Government.

WHEN AMERICAN SHIPS LED ALL.

The results of that noble trans-Atlantic steamship competition—and it was inaugurated by Democrats, I want my Democratic colleagues to understand—was all in favor of the American flag. The great American steamers drew all the best passenger traffic and broke the monopolistic freight rates of the British steamers from £7 10s. to £4 per ton. American deep-sea steam tonnage rapidly increased from 20,870 in 1849 to 115,045 in 1855, when our best ocean steamships were incomparably better than the best ocean steamships of the British fleet. Dr. David A. Wells, remembered to-day as a great authority on trade and commerce, in his history of the merchant marine, thus describes this memorable achievement:

During the single year 1849–50 we increased our ocean steam tonnage 113 per cent, and the seagoing qualities and performances of our vessels were so admirable that the Cunard company, which had then been in operation 10 years, was obliged to bring out new ships to compete with them. The prospect, therefore, at one time was that the United States, although late in the start in this new department of foreign shipping, would soon equal if not overtake her great commercial competitor.

A united country devotedly upheld the national mail-subsidy policy which was bringing such profit to the country and glory to the Stars and Stripes. Senator Bayard of Delaware—a name of high honor in the annals of the Democratic Party—in speaking directly for the subsidy to the Collins steamers, said:

I am willing to trust American skill and industry in competition with any people on the globe, when they stand nation to nation, without Government interference. But if the treasury of a foreign nation is poured into the lap of individuals for the purpose of destroying the interests of my country, or for building up a commercial marine at the expense of the commerce and prosperity of the United States, I, for one, will count no cost in countervailing such governmental action on the part of Great Britain or any foreign power.

PROTECTION OR DEFEAT AND DISHONOR.

Now, I ask Senators to listen to these eloquent words from Senator Lewis Cass, of Michigan, a distinguished western Democrat. In advocating the Collins subsidy he said:

> Well, sir, it is a question of protection—of high and important and holy protection—in the best sense of the term; the protection of our country, of our expatriated seamen, of our commerce, of our interests, of our honor, of our soil, or all that gives dignity and character to nations; protection against defeat, disgrace, and dishonor.

Merchants and shipowners of Charleston, S. C., petitioned Congress to continue to grant the Collins subsidy of $858,000, asking for it "not as residents of Charleston but as patriotic citizens of the United States."

This was the situation, Senators, when the storm of civil war began to cloud the national horizon. By the end of the decade before 1861 we all recall how the sections were splitting asunder in the fratricidal quarrel over slavery and secession. The national spirit that had been so strong and united gradually changed to sectional hatred. And with it there came a terrible but inevitable change in the national attitude toward the merchant marine.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. My recollection is that the aid to the Collins Line, which had been increased to $858,000, was reduced from that figure to the original amount, and then subsequently abandoned before the outbreak of the Civil War. I am not sure about that, but that is my recollection.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was practically abandoned. My next paragraph, I will say to the Senator, will go somewhat into detail as to that.

SUBSIDY WITHDRAWAL FATAL.

Most of those great steamships sailed from northern ports. All of the steamships were potential factors in war. There is no need to go into particulars of that sad experience. But the fact, briefly, is that on the insistence of some, though not all, of the southern Senators the national policy of mail subsidy to American steamers was cut down in 1856—just as the Senator from Florida suggests—and almost swept away in 1858 against the opposition of the merchants of the country and the opposition also of most of the public men of the Northern States and of some of the public men of the Southern States. Within a few months the American trans-Atlantic ships, without a subsidy, were overwhelmed by the British subsidized competition, now more generous and insistent than ever, and not one regular American steamship line was left in trans-Atlantic service when the Civil War actually broke out in the spring of 1861.

It was not the actual fighting of the Civil War that crippled and began to destroy the American merchant marine. Its decline had set in before the war because of the withdrawal of national aid from American shipping companies, which allowed them to be struck down by the heavily subsidized steamship companies of Great Britain. That is the record of history. It has its impressive lesson for all of us reunited Americans of to-day.

We all know and deplore how many of the passions and prejudices of the Civil War remained after the war had ended. For many years thereafter it continued to be impossible to bring the country together in support of any adequate policy of national encouragement to the merchant marine. A few brief, insufficient mail subsidies were given to American steamships to South America and across the Pacific Ocean, with scanty results because these subsidies were not persisted in as were the similar payments of Great Britain. Not until 1891 was a comprehensive shipping bill passed by the Senate of the United States, and that bill was so badly reduced and crippled in the House of Representatives that no real results were anticipated from it. As a matter of fact, that measure—the ocean mail law of March 3, 1891—was vigorously enforced by President Cleveland, in whose second administration the new American line of trans-Atlantic steamers, with first-class ships of 20 knots, was established from New York to Southampton, a line that was destined to render the country invaluable service in the Spanish War of 1898 and again in the World War of 1914. That was a subsidy law, a mail subsidy law, but it was impartially upheld alike by Republicans and by Democrats.

OUR SHRINKING SHARE IN OUR SEA TRADE.

This comparatively recent scanty mail subsidy legislation had little or no effect on our merchant marine, which had been shrinking continually from the time the broader policy of mail subsidy to American steamships was swept away in 1858. After 1860 our foreign commerce in American ships dropped rapidly from 65.2 per cent in 1861 to 26.2 per cent in 1875, to 12.8 per cent in 1890, and to 8.2 per cent in 1901.

Speaking after 1891, the postmaster general of Great Britain, Henniker Heaton, contrasting our national policy of neglect with the vigorous British policy of encouragement, said—and I hope Senators will listen to this quotation from the British postmaster general:

> As American ships were not subsidized, their owners could not compete with the Cunard and other companies, the art of shipbuilding languished, and the American carrying trade was transferred to foreign bottoms. In 1891 only 13 per cent of the exports from the United States were carried in American ships, which at one time had engrossed 90 per cent.

With a manifest contempt for American blindness and inaction, this British postmaster general added—listen to this:

> As a consequence of refusing $5,000,000 a year in subsidies during 30 years to native shipowners, or $150,000,000, the United States had to pay in the same period not less than $3,000,000,000 for freights, while their mercantile marine dwindled into insignificance.

Senators, that is the statement of the postmaster general of our great commercial rival, Great Britain, and I do not think he began to state the case as strongly as it should have been stated. Such is American maritime history as keenly seen and unerringly stated by our chief competitor.

When the World War broke out in 1914 about 9 per cent of our foreign commerce was being carried in American ships. The coming of this great conflict found us with practically no merchant marine, and it was not until 1916 that the Government, through the shipping act, showed a determined intention to put our shipping back on the seas. This was forced by the realization of the absolute necessity of protecting our country and our commerce, as well as the commerce of other nations, in view of the rapid destruction of merchant vessels by German submarines. Little was accomplished before we entered the war in 1917, however, and we were then brought to realize our helplessness and the folly of allowing our marine to fall off to the extent that we had. When the German ships were interned or withdrawn totally and the ships of the other nations were partially withdrawn, there resulted a paralysis in our export commerce which we shall never forget. A great part of our grain, cotton, meat products, lumber, copper, and manufactured goods available for export could not be moved. Our producers lost billions of dollars and our national prosperity was for a time imperiled. The resultant increase in the cost to the consumers of foreign food products, as well as to the manufacturers dependent upon essential foreign raw materials, was also tremendous. The whole country felt the effect.

FARMERS SUFFER FROM LACK OF SHIPS.

It was the farmer who suffered first from this paralysis of our export commerce. It was the farmer who was forced to pay the most extortionate freight rates by the reduced foreign shipping that remained in service. Rates on grain from Galveston to Liverpool were increased 174 per cent, on cotton 361 per cent. Other rates on agricultural products were raised to a similar extent, so that at one time our farmers were actually compelled to pay more money for the carriage of their grain to Liverpool than they received for all the labor of producing it.

The unceasing cry of our allies was, "Ships; more ships!" The cry was taken up and repeated by our own farmers, miners, merchants, and manufacturers who sought markets across the sea for their surplus products. It was necessary also to move 2,000,000 soldiers across the sea and everything required by them. Our allies made constant and heavy demands upon us which could be supplied only by more ships. The result was the purchase and construction of a vast number of vessels, which cost about three and one-half billion dollars. These ships—1,442 steel, Government-owned vessels, approximately 7,000,000 gross tons—are now the property of our country; they are our ships, and they are being handled by our agents, seven patriotic American citizens who constitute the United States Shipping Board, loyal, true men, who are doing their very best with a most difficult situation, and are entitled to our cordial, active support. They are handling to the best of their ability these Government ships and a vast deal of property connected with shipping.

The board and its agent, the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, constitute by long odds the greatest shipping organization on earth, having in its hands and under its control a much larger tonnage of ships than has ever before been handled by a single corporation since the world began. We must give every assistance in our power to the Shipping Board, in order that it may make a success of its giant task and in so doing may perform service of inestimable value to the Republic. The board has made the most elaborate study of every question connected with shipping and presented its findings and recommendations to the President, who, in turn, has sent them to Congress, as I have indicated herein. We can not do better than follow the advice of the Shipping Board.

WE SHOULD CARRY HALF OUR COMMERCE.

It is important for many reasons—indeed, it is imperative in the interest of national welfare—that the United States create and maintain a merchant marine capable of carrying not less than one-half its foreign commerce, and that at least 50 per cent of its exports and imports of every kind, including passengers, be actually carried in ships owned, operated, financed, and insured by Americans. The percentage is fixed at one-half on the assumption that our imports will about equal our exports for some years to come, and it is fair for our ships to handle an amount equivalent to the volume of our exports. We must of necessity for a long while import practically as much as we export; for most of the world is unable to pay us any money, and the only practical way to engage in foreign trade is by barter and exchange of commodities.

Without imports we would in many cases either have to produce the things now imported or cease to use them. Our climate, soil, and resources are not favorable to the production of many articles which we import in large quantities.

American ships are our delivery wagons. They belong to us. We are vitally interested in their success. Their officers and crews are citizens of the United States, who pay taxes and perform the same patriotic duties as other citizens of the Republic. Foreigners are our competitors in selling. Why should we make our business rivals act as salesmen and delivery wagons for us? Is it reasonable to expect them to work solely for our interest? Would our great merchants be satisfied to have deliveries of their goods made by their competitors?

The same principle applies on the seas. The ships of the British, our chief maritime rivals, pay no taxes in America to sustain our schools and churches, our Government and civilization. The wages earned by English crews go to make homes in Britain, while our sailors make American homes. The earnings of British ships pay interest on capital and insurance to British companies, while our ships earn a return for American investments and American insurance companies.

UNITED STATES SHIPS VITAL TO UNITED STATES TRADE.

The United States is a great mercantile Nation of 110,000,000 souls, having close business connections with the whole world; and our only means of transportation to the people from whom we buy and to whom we sell, except as to Canada and Mexico, is by ship. The ship is to the sea—which covers 73 per cent of the earth's surface, the land being only 27 per cent—what the steamboat is to canal and river, the freight and passenger train to the railway, the truck and automobile to the highway. It is the means of transporting freight and passengers from place to place; and just as Americans own and operate the agencies of transportation on their interior waters, highways, and railways so should they own and operate enough ships to carry their commerce on the seas.

During the calendar year 1921 our total foreign commerce, aggregating forty-six and a half million cargo tons, was valued at $6,000,000,000. The commerce of 1920 was double that amount in value, and it is thought that the commerce of the current year will be worth greatly in excess of six billions. Exports in 1921 were valued at $3,806,995,000 and imports at $2,186,365,000. Of this total commerce of exports and imports last year 36 per cent was carried in British vessels, 35 per cent in American, and 29 per cent in ships of all other nations. These figures are exclusive of the oil and Great Lakes trade. It thus appears that only a little more than one-third of our foreign commerce, excluding oil and that handled on the Great Lakes, was carried in American ships.

In general, economists figure that ocean freight charges average about 8 per cent of the value of the goods carried. On this basis, by making an analysis of the returns of the Department of Commerce, it is possible to figure out what was paid for shipping to various nations engaged in trade with this country. For the calendar year 1921 the freight moneys divided among three classes of shipping were as follows:

American	$171,000,000
British	172,000,000
Others	135,000,000
Total	478,000,000

Of this large sum paid for freight, 36 per cent went to British vessels, 35 per cent to American, and 29 per cent to the ships of all other countries combined. The division of earnings by flags was as follows in millions of dollars: British, 172.3; American, 171.0; Japanese, 33.6; French, 20.1; Norwegian, 18.8; Dutch, 18.5; Italian, 14.3; Danish, 6.2; Swedish, 6.1; Spanish, 5.7; Belgian, 2.8; German, 1.4; and others, 7.1.

In addition to this vast sum of $307,000,000 paid to foreigners last year for freight on our commerce, we sent them more than $100,000,000 for marine insurance—a total payment to foreigners of $407,000,000 in 1921 for marine freight and insurance, at least one-third of which should have been kept at home.

OUR SHIPS FAILING IN COMPETITION.

A cursory analysis of trade returns shows—and, Mr. President and Senators, this is a sad thing to me—that American shipping is not standing up under competition, and that matters are growing worse instead of better. In December, 1920, over 50 per cent of the vessels engaged in our foreign trade were under the American flag, and with that number we were carrying slightly more than 38 per cent of the value of the total exports and imports. In December, 1921, however, although we still had more than 50 per cent of the active ships, we carried only 29 per cent of the value of the goods; and the value of the goods carried last December—1921—to the net tonnage of the vessels engaged was only $28 for the American ship per ton to $68 for the foreign tonnage.

We were carrying 50 per cent of our trade in our own ships two years ago, exclusive of oil and the Great Lakes trade. Since then the volume of ship tonnage under the American flag has grown steadily, and the proportion of cargo tonnage or commerce moving in our own vessels has declined almost as steadily. In May, 1920, 50.1 per cent of our imports were American-carried; in December, 1921, only 28.5 per cent—a decline of nearly 22 per cent. In the same period the proportion of our exports going in American bottoms has fallen about 20 per cent.

BRITISH SHIPS LEAD IN OUR OWN TRADE.

In fact, we have now reached the point where British ships are carrying more of our trade than we are. I do not mean merely in the trade between the United States and British possessions, but between the United States and the world. The same is true of the minor maritime nations grouped together; so that out of the three groups comprised of British vessels, all other foreign vessels, and American vessels our ships are now at the tail of the procession, carrying only slightly more than a quarter of our foreign commerce. This is true of the amount of cargo carried as well as the value of that cargo. Figures compiled by the Shipping Board show that in the last month for which I have a record—December, 1921—out of 3,505,000 tons carried in the overseas trade, 1,098,000 were transported in British vessels, 1,390,000 in those of other foreign merchant marines, and only 1,017,000 in American bottoms.

Great Britain is our chief competitor; but there are many others who must not be discounted as rivals, as a glance at the millions of dollars paid out in freight last year will show. Norwegian ships alone took not far from twenty millions. How much of this do you suppose was received for carrying goods between the United States and Norway? Eighty per cent of the Norwegian ships coming to and going from the United States are engaged in commerce in which Norway has not one penny of interest, either as the buyer or seller of the goods.

Nearly thirty-five millions went to Japanese ships, twenty millions to French, about nineteen millions to Holland, and about fifteen millions to Italy. Denmark, Sweden, Spain, Belgium, and Germany were all credited with lesser amounts, which amounts, however, run into the millions; and after the ships of all these nations have had their share there still remains an item of over seven millions earned by the ships of other countries in our carrying trade. Who are these others? They include vessels of the merchant marines of Finland, Honduras, Chile, Cuba, Yugoslavia, and a few other nations.

BRITAIN CARRIES HALF WORLD'S COMMERCE.

We can not, of course, expect to have all our foreign trade carried in American vessels; but we are at least entitled to one-half of it. Britain's merchant marine carries two-thirds of Britain's trade, nine-tenths of the trade of her possessions, and so large a slice of the commerce of other countries that it is estimated her ships transport more than half of the world's sea trade. She carried 36 per cent of our ocean commerce during 1921, and figures just issued by the British Government show that American vessels in 1921 transported less than 5 per cent of the sea-borne trade of the United Kingdom. This is a splendid showing for Britain and a very poor one for us.

It is manifest that we are letting our ocean-carrying trade slip away from us, and that if nothing is done to aid our merchant marine we may cut an even smaller figure on the seas than before the war, when less than 10 per cent of our trade was American-carried.

The United States has never given any but mail subsidies to American ships. The provision to pay to American "tramp" cargo steamers of less than 13 knots a compensation of one-half of a cent per gross ton for each 100 nautical miles sailed, that is contained in the new shipping bill, undeniably marks a new departure in marine legislation. Higher compensation is provided for faster ships of regular services carrying the mails on a per ton per hundred miles basis; but these ships thus compensated must carry the mails without the pay provided by the present law, which means a return of a sizable portion of the subsidy.

AID WILL MAKE SHIP SALES POSSIBLE.

If the Government does not extend direct aid to shipping, and thereby materially encourage men to enter into the shipping business with a reasonable prospect for earning a fair return on their investment, it will be impossible for the Shipping Board to dispose of the greater portion of its very large fleet of slow, moderate-sized vessels. Most of these ships are suitable only for the tramp service, being small to medium size, 3,000 to 7,000 tons, with a rather slow steaming radius, and not equipped to carry passengers. Vessels of this class, if given reasonable assistance, as provided in the pending bill, can operate from a number of the smaller ports of America with a fair prospect of success, thereby establishing business out of these ports to the great benefit of the country generally, increasing the number of its ocean ports, and preventing congestion. The prospect of such a business as this, conducted in smaller vessels, will naturally create a demand for them, and the Shipping Board will have an opportunity to sell a great many, if not all of them, whereas without such special aid or subsidy, if that term be preferred, a vast number of these vessels will remain in the hands of the Shipping Board indefinitely, with colossal ultimate loss to the Nation.

It is my candid opinion that the increased value of the Shipping Board vessels and the creation of a market for them resulting from the passage of the pending bill, especially the provision for direct aid, will more than offset the total amount paid by the Government in aid of shipping under the bill during the next 10 years. In other words, I consider that sound business justifies the passage of this bill in order that the Government may be able to dispose of a very costly asset to its own citizens, which is now unsalable, and which by the passage of the measure would be rendered saleable at a reasonable price.

Even if a strong American merchant marine were not needed for patriotic reasons, nor for the purpose of handling at least one-half of our vast commerce, nor for use as a naval auxiliary, then we should pass this bill to create a market for the big lot of vessels now in the hands of the board.

THE SOUTH VITALLY CONCERNED.

I would particularly invite the attention of Senators from Southern States to the fact that this compensation or aid to the slower, smaller cargo ships is of especial value to the South, with its exports of cotton, lumber, tobacco, and other bulky commodities. Without aid to these slower cargo ships it is not probable that many of our existing services in Shipping Board steamers can be continued out of southern ports, or that these ports will maintain a foothold for the gradual development of the faster and larger passenger ships, to a share of which they are rightfully entitled. Compensation for mail steamers, amply justified by Democratic precedents which I have cited, would not suffice for present southern interests. There must be compensation also for the cargo "tramps" especially adapted to our new and growing lines if those lines are to be saved to the ports of the South Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico.

Within the last four or five years we have seen the creation of a new sea power on the South Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico—an American sea power of ships managed and operated from our southern ports, purchasing their stores there, employing their crews there, carrying our commerce to markets some of which we have never reached before. Foreign ships had come and gone through the years—ships built abroad, owned abroad, officered and manned abroad, distributing their profits mostly abroad, and carrying our commerce on routes which foreign shipowners and merchants determined. In other words, the European maritime powers had held our southern ports in almost absolute vassalage, and had destroyed all hope of an American shipping of our own. Are there any of us who would like to have these old conditions return to Norfolk, or Newport News, or Wilmington, or Charleston, or Savannah, or Jacksonville, or Tampa, or Mobile, or New Orleans, or Houston, or Galveston?

No; never! Equally with our brethren of the North, we of the South want our own American merchant marine, and this proposed bill points more clearly and powerfully than any bill which we have seen before the way in which we can secure and keep it.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate in open executive session stand in recess until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 25, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, Thou hast given us such beautiful ministries as the unseen love, the unannounced joy, and the satisfactions of labor that fill the common and the unheeded ways of life. For these gracious bounties we have no self-satisfying return, but in our hearts is the psalm of gratitude. We would ask Thee for wisdom to conceive, for power to execute, and for love to constrain, that we may at all times seek the good and prefer to do it. O be a shield, a staff, and a shelter to the loves of our hearthstones and those who may be away, and when the harsh winds blow hold them to Thy breast. In the name of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. HARRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, who has been elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Representative H. D. Flood, of the tenth district of Virginia, may be permitted to take the oath of office without presenting his credentials. He was elected without opposition, I may say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asks unanimous consent that Mr. TUCKER may be permitted to take the oath of office at the present time, although his credentials have not arrived. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TUCKER appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3300. An act granting a pension to Marie Doughty Gorgas.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 263) authorizing the purchase of land for cemeteries for American military dead in Europe and for improvement thereof.

ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF GOVERNOR CALVERT.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, to-day is the two hundred and eighty-eighth anniversary of the landing of Gov. Leonard Calvert at St. Clements Island, in the settlement of Maryland, a colony dedicated to religious and civic liberty. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for the War Department.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10871, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk report the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the National Guard asked for an appropriation of $1,928,000 for this item, and they stated that it was necessary for the continued development of the National Guard along the lines that they were then developing. Now, it does seem to me there ought to be a policy one way or the other. We ought to make a sufficient appropriation here to enable the National Guard to develop in the way that it is now developing, or we ought to adopt the committee report, which is on the line of eliminating all expensive technical units. And in order to bring that question before the committee I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] by substituting $1,928,000.

Mr. CRAGO. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. And then we will have the proposition directly before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia offer his amendment now?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARRISON. One minute, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his amendment to the Clerk.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to substitute $1,936,320.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment offered by Mr. CRAGO: Page 79, line 25, strike out "$800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,936,320."

Mr. HARRISON. My object, Mr. Chairman, in offering the amendment is to bring squarely before this committee the question as to whether we wish to develop the National Guard according to the lines on which it is now being developed or whether we wish to eliminate all the expensive technical units in the service. Now, it seems to me to be utterly unfair, if we are going to continue the expensive units that I have referred to—the Cavalry, the Tank Corps, and the various technical units of the National Guard—that we should not stop the progress now being developed in the National Guard. Why should the States that now have these units be permitted to have them while States that need them should be denied them by reason of the appropriation? Therefore I think that we should bring the question squarely before the committee as to whether we are going to have these units in the National Guard. If we are going to have them, the National Guard in the various States that do not now have them should be permitted to organize them, and they should not be confined to the States that have already organized them. Therefore I offer the amendment in the present case in order that the committee can pass directly upon the question, and if they vote down this amendment, then we ought to vote down all the amendments to the committee report.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat amazed at my friend's amendment, because he is now asking for several thousand dollars more than the Militia Bureau itself asked for. They asked for only $1,928,000. The gentleman asks for $1,936,320.

Mr. HARRISON. I took it from the record of the hearings.

Mr. SISSON. They made an estimate of $1,928,000. But it shows you, gentlemen of the committee, that when a man gets the military spirit in him a few thousand dollars does not make any difference.

Now, I believe that every real friend of the National Guard will oppose this amendment. The moment you convince the American people that the National Guard is as expensive a unit as the Regular Army, then there is no argument in favor of the National Guard.

The gentleman who is at the head of the National Guard now, if he had his way, while he is unwilling to put his judgment against that of the General Staff, believes that the development of the soldier as an infantryman and an artilleryman is as far as we ought to go. Now——

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to read from the hearings exactly what he said.

Mr. SISSON. I have not the time to yield now.

Mr. HARRISON. It is $1,928,000.

Mr. SISSON. But you ask for $1,936,000.

Now, I want to say to you, gentlemen, that if you will look at the appropriation here for 1914—I believe it was; I may be mistaken as to exactly the year—the National Guard appropriations were $800,000 and some odd, perhaps nearly $900,000. Next year it was about $1,000,000, and then this bill now carries between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000 for the National Guard.

In other words, it increased from the year 1914 down to the present time from less than $1,000,000 to more than $25,000,000. We make provision in this bill to take care not only of the National Guard as it is now, but if they propose to develop the organization of infantrymen at the close of the next year we are asked to provide that the outlay for forage of the National Guard may be $1,928,000—the greatest National Guard that ever we had since the organization of this Government. And yet my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. HARRISON] comes and asks this committee to give $1,936,000, which is $8,000 more than was originally asked for.

Now, I can not conceive of this committee, committed as you have been on your side to a policy of economy, committed as our party has always been to economy—I can not conceive how you will not only add 100 per cent but more than 100 per cent to this item; and if you continue to develop technical units, airplane units, chemical-warfare units, and cavalry units, you will find the people themselves will become so heartily disgusted with the National Guard that they will scourge out of Congress any man responsible for that extravagance. Wherever you find these units where the boys drill three or four times a week and keep horses and other expensive accouterments and implements the taxpayers of that neighborhood will complain of the expense.

I may be doing wrong in thus stating the attitude of the taxpayer, the man who pays the taxes, but I do believe you ought to give some attention to him, especially in view of the fact that we are willing to develop the National Guard in numbers as rapidly as the country wants, except that we are denying to this organization technical units that are more expensive than the ordinary organization of the National Guard requires, and I hope this amendment will be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to change my amendment to "$1,928,000" instead of "$1,936,000." I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be made to read "$1,928,320."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the gentleman's amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARRISON: Page 79, line 25, strike out the figures "$800,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,928,320."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, when we passed the national defense act of 1916, in providing for the National Guard we laid the foundation for a military force which, if it is allowed to grow, can expand, as we all hope it will, until it will far eclipse the Regular Army, not only in the number of men but in its military strength. It means that within a very few years you will have a force of approximately 440,000 men in the National Guard.

All we did at that time was to prescribe the maximum to which it should grow, something over 400,000 men. The War Department was authorized to prescribe the details of its organization. Under regulations adopted by the Board of the General Staff, which formulated the organization of this new guard which we authorized in 1916, they provided that it should consist of 18 divisions. A division now consists of 14,000 men. Of the 18 divisions, 15 are to be infantry and 3 are to be cavalry. We are at present considering an item for the forage of the animals now in the National Guard, not only for the cavalry regiments but other mounted units of the National Guard.

Mr. HILL. Field artillery, for instance.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. Now, if we allow the National Guard to expand along the lines of the organization prescribed by the War Department, it means that instead of providing 8,000 animals, as we are asked by the War Department now, in a few years you will be asked to provide for 60,000 or 70,000 animals, according to the number of animals per unit prescribed for the artillery and the cavalry.

Your committee thought it was not good policy for Congress to permit any such expensive expansion, not only because they thought the Cavalry units were unnecessary from the military standpoint, or so large a proportion of Cavalry, because of the well-known fact that Cavalry is rapidly going out of date as a preponderant arm in the military service; but from the standpoint of expense, which you can readily see is foreshadowed here, and the ultimate cost of the National Guard when fully organized, will amount to more than that of the Regular Army now.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. What is the practical use of a Cavalry troop in a State now, as compared with what it has been in past times, as a branch of the National Militia? Would it be for the purpose of putting down insurrection or disorder?

Mr. ANTHONY. For that purpose, in my opinion, a company of Infantry would be worth more than a Cavalry troop.

Mr. LAYTON. From that standpoint a Cavalry troop would be useless along the border?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I do not know as to that.

Mr. LAYTON. Largely.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There are a number of very efficient National Guard Artillery units. Several of them are motorized and some of them are mounted. I was wondering what effect this cut will have upon these Artillery units. It seems to me that is very important, because artillery is very important to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee has provided for only one-half of the number of animals that the War Department has suggested for the National Guard, and undoubtedly it would be necessary to demount some of those mounted units and convert them into some other form of organization.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Would not that disturb the balance of the organization in the division and create a situation somewhat like that which existed before the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not believe the Artillery of the guard is organized in detail into divisions. I think it is organized as Army and corps Artillery.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that Cavalry was particularly useful in the patrol of the Mexican border?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but I said that for local use in preserving order, in my opinion, Infantry was more effective than Cavalry.

Mr. NORTON. Was not the patrolling of the border more effective by the Cavalry than by the Infantry?

I know in the patrol of the Mexican border there was a troop of cavalry from Cleveland that was said to have rendered excellent service.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact that at the present time there are 8,000 horses in use by the various establishments of the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are issued to the National Guard, but I deny that they are in use.

Mr. SNYDER. They are supposed to be in use, and are now held for use when desired.

Mr. ANTHONY. A gentleman suggests that they are now in the livery stables.

Mr. SNYDER. That is a statement that is made, and perhaps it is true. But there are times in the year when training is in operation when these horses would all be used.

Mr. ANTHONY. True.

Mr. SNYDER. Now, if the appropriation is left as it stands in the bill, it will reduce by one-half the number of horses that are now on call for this purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. These horses are an absolute necessity if the units that are now organized go into training, are they not?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the Government could provide them with horses when they go into their annual training camps.

Mr. SNYDER. From elsewhere?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; when they report for duty at the camps for their summer training, the Government could have the animals there.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to say just this much further to the gentleman. I would be disposed to hold the number of horses where it is, but I am absolutely opposed to reducing the number so as to lessen the opportunity to give training to those who desire it. It is very important that we keep up the proper spirit in the National Guard, so that they can enlist men and maintain the interest in the organization, and unless you have the tools, the machinery, and the horses for them to train with, you can not expect any permanent sentiment in favor of men going into the National Guard.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I can say to the gentleman that the committee has the same purpose in view. We really do not want to cut off one efficient mounted organization of the guard. If they can take away the animals from some of the companies which can probably be just as efficiently maintained as infantry, or some cheaper form of organization, we want them to do it; but before we get through with this thing I am sure we want to provide all the money that is necessary to take care of the present efficient organizations in the guard. But let me outline a statement of policy that perhaps will change the gentleman's view.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to break in just once more, and then I will subside. The gentleman uses the expression "some cheaper form of organization."

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. It seems to me we are all trying to economize wherever we can, but it is not always economy to do the cheapest thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. But in this case I will say to the gentleman that the War Department has practically reached the same conclusion——

Mr. SNYDER. I am willing to be convinced.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have a communication from the War Department in which they at last say they are ready to consider a new table of organization for units of the guard.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Before the gentleman makes his statement of policy will he give us this information: How many animals are taken care of by the appropriation recommended by the committee, and how many will be taken care of by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] if adopted?

Mr. ANTHONY. The amount recommended by the committee would take care of 4,000 animals in the National Guard, and the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] would take care of 9,200. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] would take care of about 8,000.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. How many are provided now?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are 8,000 in the guard now.

Mr. CRAGO. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], as I understand, takes care of what they had proposed to issue to the National Guard, bringing the number up to 9,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct. Now, it is interesting to go back to 1915. We had then 120,000 men in the National Guard, and they cost us $7,500,000 a year. We now have 140,000 men in the National Guard and we are appropriating $21,500,000 for them.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman will admit that since that time we have enacted legislation which gives pay to these men and officers.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. CRAGO. And we have federalized the National Guard since that time and relieved the States from a great deal of the financial burden.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am simply stating this in order to show the growth of the expense of maintaining the National Guard.

Now, in the table of organization which has been prescribed for the National Guard the War Department has ordered that units of the class that I am going to read to you be formed, and it will be apparent at once that under this table of organization it is going to cost us ever-increasing amounts of money to maintain the guard if it is permitted. They are not only going to carry the three divisions of Cavalry that I spoke to you about, but in the table of organization they propose to create in the National Guard observation squadrons in the Air Service, balloon groups, balloon companies, balloon parks, photo sections of balloon groups, air parks, communication sections, all in the Air Service. In the Medical Service they propose to form medical regiments in the National Guard and headquarters corps medical services for each corps headquarters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the quartermaster activities they propose to organize in the guard train headquarters, corps trains, motor-transport companies, motor-cycle companies, motor repair sections, and wagon trains. Under the head of special corps troops they propose to organize signal battalions, military police battalions, field remount depots, service battalions, ordnance companies, and so on down the list. Why, gentlemen, if we allow them to develop along these lines, in two or three years we will be appropriating just as much for the National Guard as we are appropriating for the Regular Army to-day.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. What kind of an army will it be if it does not have these details?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Regular Army will supply these necessary details and such technical organizations as would be necessary in war.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri, but I would like to finish this statement first, because I do not want to occupy all the time in the debate. During the hearings this matter was taken up with the Secretary of War, and I want to quote him.

Secretary Weeks says:

If you go directly to the question which you asked me, I think your militia costs are going to mount much higher than warranted if you are going to spend much money for the supplementary service connected with the Army. Generally speaking, that should be left to the Regulars. The militia should be largely infantry, and that, from the militia standpoint, would do much to lower the cost of the service. Turning over horses, air machines, and various other things, including tanks, to militiamen on the whole, is not well advised. I will not say that it should not be done at all, because I think we should have enough with the militia organizations so that they would know what a tank is.

That is an expression in absolute harmony with the committee's view. Since the hearings and since this bill has come before the House the committee has received a letter from the Secretary of War which is, in substance, a statement that the present tables of organization of the National Guard are unduly expensive; that they can by reorganization work out a saving of money, and a committee of the General Staff has been formed to undertake a study of new organization tables. The suggestion is made to Congress, whether it shall be taken up in this bill or will be taken up before the bill becomes a law, I do not know, or whether it should be taken up by another committee of the House, I will not say, but the recommendation is made to Congress that there should be restrictions on the growth of the guard along lines now authorized. There should unquestionably be a change in the present method of its organization.

The Secretary's letter is as follows:

MARCH 21, 1922.

Hon. D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ANTHONY: During my recent hearing before your subcommittee the question of modifying the present allotment of National Guard troops to the States, with a view of eliminating some of the more expensive units which could be organized in a less expensive category, was informally discussed, and I agreed to examine more fully into the matter and to furnish you my views thereon. With this object in view I have had prepared a study showing the basis of the present plan for the organization of the National Guard and the state of its development. A copy of this study is transmitted herewith.

It will be noted that the present plan and allotments to the States were prepared in the War Department by a special committee of the General Staff, organized in accordance with section 3a of the act of June 4, 1920, and which consisted of 3 members of the General Staff and 10 National Guard officers of wide experience, and that in addition the allotments were discussed with the State authorities concerned, adjustments made, and finally accepted by all States. This plan is believed to be the first comprehensive program for the development of the National Guard under any law.

I desire to invite your attention to the provisions of existing laws upon which the present plan is based, especially to section 62 of the act of June 4, 1920, which prescribe the strength of the National Guard. It will be noted that the strength of the National Guard is identical with that prescribed in the act of June 3, 1916. It will also be noted that in the last mentioned act no provision was made for reserve forces except the reserves of the Regular Army and of the National Guard, which, as we knew, failed to develop. On the other hand, the act of June 4, 1920, provides for the development of the Organized Reserves, and this feature gives us the opportunity to develop in this component with the minimum expenditures of public funds such units as can be more economically provided for therein in accordance with the principles recently enunciated to you by General Pershing.

It appears from the study that the above facts were clearly realized by the officers who prepared the plan, but in order to utilize the prescribed strength of the National Guard without having an excessive number of divisional units or independent infantry organizations, and in order to avoid reorganization of units on mobilization, the difference between the numbers required for the 18 divisions and the prescribed strength was placed in corps and Army troops, where they could be employed most usefully in case of mobilization. With the exception of some small units of special troops, all of those organizations would be available for use by the States in time of peace.

I have examined into the basis of the present plan, and I am constrained to believe that it was formulated in good faith and in accordance with the law and the intent of the Congress as expressed therein. At the same time it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that since the enactment of our basic military law and since the formulation of the present plan for the development of the National Guard the situation has been changed in important particulars. The States as well as the Federal Government are confronted with the urgent necessity of reducing expenditures. This is reflected in the reduction of the Regular Army component in strength from 280,000 to 150,000 enlisted men. The States are confronted with large expenditures for armories and other facilities above those which now exist. From the best information available the States are reluctant to meet the requirements demanded by the ultimate expansion of the National Guard as now required by law. In view of these facts it appears to me that a more modest development of the National Guard is in the best interests of that component as well as of the country.

There are two methods by which the desired adjustment may be accomplished:

(a) By limiting the strength and development of the National Guard by appropriations.

(b) By prescribing a more reasonable requirement as to prescribed peace strength.

In my opinion the latter is the fairest and best; moreover, it is due to both the National Guard and to the War Department to know where they stand. In view of the fact that the present peace strength was fixed solely by the Congress, and being fearful of being misunderstood by the National Guard, I hesitate to make any definite recommendations.

The suggestion has been made from National Guard sources that a peace strength of 250,000, or 450 or 500 per Senator and Representative, would be adequate at the present time. This strength would permit of the completion of the 18 Infantry divisions, a proper proportion of Cavalry troops, the Coast Artillery companies and certain independent Infantry, and special troop units which are essential and necessary. I consider the 18 Infantry divisions the keystone of the structure, and, in my opinion, nothing should be done which would interfere with their completion. It is possible that certain auxiliary units which are included in the division could be withdrawn, such as the air squadron and the tank company, in those cases where the States will have difficulty in maintaining units of this character.

In order to ascertain what can be done along the lines indicated above, I have directed that a committee, organized as required by law, be assembled to study these questions, in cooperation with the Chief of the Militia Bureau, preparatory to revising the present plan for the development of the National Guard, should the reduction mentioned above be authorized at any time in the future.

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Now, gentlemen, I hope that the House will not radically increase these appropriations for forage and other maintenance items of the National Guard. They have purposely been reduced to a minimum by the committee with the idea that we will take care of any changes in the policy of the War Department so as to amply provide for the National Guard.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I think anybody who has very carefully studied the situation of the National Guard and its relation to the Army, and the general scheme of the national defense, will quite agree that there is a possibility of the introduction of too many technical units into the National Guard. The National Guard by the very nature of its being can not be as stable an institution, of course, as the Regular Establishment, because its personnel is held to no obligation of life service, and, as a matter of fact, as we all understand, simply engages in the National Guard activities after it has got through with its day's work. As the personnel of the National Guard is more or less casual, the younger men change their residence quite frequently, and after a time as youth and its inclination to military matters pass and the older men, more mature, do not give attention to it, there is constantly a change in the personnel, and therefore there is less stability in the National Guard. That is one reason why the more complicated technical units ought not to be so widely distributed throughout the National Guard. I think the National Guard men themselves would readily concede that.

But I do think there ought to be some reasonable compromise on the thing. I doubt if it is wise to proceed on the theory that it is good economy to maintain the National Guard almost exclusively with Infantry just because the Infantry does not cost as much as the more complicated and technical units. What is our experience every time there is an emergency? One arose when they were summoned for participation in the World War. The infantryman can be secured in great numbers, and it is fair to say that he does not need a very strict technical training to place him in the field at the start. His preparation for the field is apparently simple when compared with the preparation necessary to make a good field artilleryman or a good cavalryman or an aviation man, and so on throughout the service. Of course, if he specializes in some of the activities in infantry he has as technical a job as anybody else. But I speak of the rifle-carrying infantryman, who does not have as much to learn besides taking care of himself as do others. The man in other organizations has animals or great mechanical engines to look after. So I say we were confronted in the World War with the proposition that all at once, when there was no time, we were called upon to produce these highly specialized and technical military units and organizations for which there had been no practical foundation laid to any great extent throughout the militia of the country, and it is not a very simple matter to do.

It seems to me there ought to be some provision in a law of this kind that at least sprinkled through the National Guard there will be a sufficient number of these technical units, so that there can be an opportunity for the National Guard man to familiarize himself with the peculiar technique that those services require, and keep them in such a manner that when war time does come the matter of expansion will be more practical and easy.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is said by the minority representative of the Committee on Appropriations that he is willing to have any number of men in the National Guard, but that he does not want to have the special training for them which consists in tanks, cavalry, artillery, and so forth. That is to say, that we shall enroll any number of men but shall not give them the training of an army. We know that the Signal Corps, the Artillery, the Cavalry, and the various branches of the service which tie the Army together are what makes an army, and unless we have a balanced National Guard it is no army.

The particular proposition is fairly stated as follows: We are using 8,000 horses now in the National Guard for artillery and cavalry, and it is proposed to reduce the number to 4,000. The proposition assumes that it is good policy for this country to starve out the cavalry and the artillery of the National Guard. I deny that. The gentleman from Kansas says that cavalry are of no use in time of peace. A mounted troop is what keeps order in Pennsylvania throughout the coal-mining district. It has done that for years, and when we had the riots and trouble in the State of New Jersey 1 troop was worth 10 companies of infantry because it could get where it was wanted and do the necessary thing. Those troops are made up of a character of men who know how to deal with the strikers as gentlemen should deal with them. There are now in my State 12 troops of cavalry, a regiment. A lieutenant colonel of the Army is with them, drilling them three and four days a week. They have to drill in parcels because they have not enough horses to go around. They are made up very largely of veterans of the late war who have reenlisted in the Cavalry because they know they can do hard and good work there. A cavalryman has to learn not only to be an infantryman, but a cavalryman as well. He has to know how to ride horses of all sorts, so that when he is called out for maneuvers in the summer, when it is proposed to give horses to men who do not know how to ride, there will be men who do know how to ride. Mounted troops are found necessary for all sorts of work about camps, military police, scouting duty, and the joining together of the various units. There is nothing that takes the place of a good regiment of cavalry and mounted artillery for getting there and doing the work, and there is no training that is equal to it. I say that without hesitation. Those 12 troops in New Jersey were 1 troop before the war, and from the men they trained in a course of years they put over 200 officers in the war. Troopers were selected and preferred because of their activity.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman advise the committee how many cavalry troops there were in the State militia in the State of New Jersey before the National Government nationalized the National Guard?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. One.

Mr. STAFFORD. And under this nationalization of the guard how many are there to-day?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We have 12 troops.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That one troop was in one town. We have 12 troops now in some 10 different towns. We are giving to the people of the State—the young men—real training, a training which is that of a soldier who takes risks from day to day, and they become men who do what they are told to do with energy and fervor, and you can not get that energy from anything except a man who is used to going as fast as a horse will carry him. I stand for the Cavalry as a means of training the young men, and when we can say that we have 8,000 horses now actively employed in our militia in the Cavalry and in the Artillery, it is a crying shame that men who say they stand for national defense should want to starve out those organizations by taking away the horses. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. I am very glad to have heard the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] on the side of the National Guard cavalrymen and field artillery. I can never forget that during the border trouble in 1916 the cavalry of Virginia, which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] has in mind, the Richmond Blues, had been a distinguished infantry organization since the Revolutionary War, and that the needs of the border service in 1916 made it necessary that these historic Richmond Blues should become a mounted organization. They were a National Guard unit that served on the Texas border when the horse and the horseman were necessary for the protection of that border. Nor can I forget that those same Richmond Blues became a part of the Blue and Gray Division and became the mounted section of the One hundred and fourth Ammunition Train of the Twenty-ninth Division; and that those same cavalrymen, for whom the gentleman from Virginia speaks, bore the ammunition to your troops north of Verdun in October, 1918.

You need mounted troops in the National Guard. You should not wipe them out. I can not fail to recall the services of the mounted troops of the State of New Jersey. It is true there were fewer troops before this war. My recollection, however, is that there was more than one troop in New Jersey; but I do know that the mounted troops of New Jersey served with the mounted troops of Virginia and with the mounted troops of the National Guard of Maryland in this last war in the Twenty-ninth Division, in which all of the National Guard of New Jersey, Maryland, District of Columbia, and Virginia were incorporated. And I know the vital and necessary work that was done by the mounted National Guard troops of Virginia, New Jersey, District of Columbia, and Maryland in actual war days when, for the first time in the history of this war, your troops pushed back the enemy from the machine-gun protected fastnesses north of Verdun and opened the hinge upon which the whole movement of the front turned just before the armistice.

Now, gentlemen, I know it is the fashion to say that the horse is no longer necessary and that practically no war implements will be necessary in the near future. I say to you there is not a man who served in this last war but does not abhor war, and yet some here say that because a man was in this war he has become a militarist. I say to you it is up to the American people to decide what kind of protection they want. If they do not want the National Guard, I do not think we will hurt the feelings of the members of the National Guard. It is only a question of what protection you want.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask for another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Now, this amendment provides for 9,200 animals for the Cavalry and for the Field Artillery of the National Guard. At the present time you have 8,009. The committee provision cuts in half the present mounted service of the National Guard. If this committee desires to do that, if you desire to cut down your units which you have organized, or if you desire to discourage the National Guard in this essential component of its tactical organization, adopt the committee provision. If you do not, vote for the Harrison amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman give me eight minutes? If not, I shall object. I have not spoken on the bill yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. NORTON. If you will give me eight minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; but will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, it is the disposition of the chairman of the committee to conclude the consideration of this bill to-day. We have not only the National Guard item, but the river and harbor item, which will provoke debate, and the Panama Canal item still to consider. This is Saturday and it is usually a short day in the consideration of the House, and if we are to take two or three hours for the consideration of the National Guard items it will be impossible to conclude the consideration of this bill. It is not the disposition of the committee to foreclose any Member in speaking, but we do wish——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. MANN. It is absolutely impossible to finish this bill to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the wish of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is the wish of every man who has charge of a bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman give me eight minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate upon the amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Michigan) there were—ayes 61, noes 22.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is well known by a great many of you that I am not in favor of cutting the Army the way they have cut it. I am not in favor of cutting the National Guard the way they are cutting it. I do not believe in wiping out the protection of our country. Take, for instance, what they are doing to-day. I am going to speak of two organizations only. The Cleveland Grays were organized in 1837. To-day they are part of the National Guard. They have been in every war since then, and all but four or five—I think four—became commissioned officers in the last war. That is what that kind of an organization does. That is what it is. The city troop of Cleveland was one of the first to go down to the Mexican border and they were the last to return. They were among the first in France. The first city troop of Cleveland was first organized as a cavalry company. You all remember the Black Horse Cavalry. They came down here for three inaugurations. That is the kind of an organization they are. They were sent down to Mexico and were the patroling company on the border during the entire time. They stayed there until it was over, and they got back just in time to go to France. They went to France, and they went as an Artillery company. Every man was prepared [applause] and practically every man became an officer. That is what training does, gentlemen. There were two organizations, of which nearly every man became a commissioned officer, available when you wanted them, and that is one reason I am in favor of saving the National Guard; that is the reason also I am in favor of maintaining the Army. There comes a time when you need them, and preparation is better than a fight. America to-day stands first. The time may come when she will not stand first unless we maintain an Army so everybody will respect us. If we desire to be respected it is necessary we be prepared. I want to state to you, gentlemen, that there is preparation in a National Guard. What could we do without cavalry on the Mexican border? They were needed once and may be again; and you needed artillery, and we had them then because we were prepared for the business they were to do, and they were prepared also to train other enlisted men. [Applause.]

I have known something about it, having been connected with one of them, and I know that the man who is trained in one of those organizations can at any time, I care not when, command a company. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have read in my time a communication which I send to the Clerk's desk.

GRAND LEDGE, MICH., March 20, 1922.

From: Commanding officer Battery D, Field Artillery, Michigan National Guard, Grand Ledge, Mich.
To: The adjutant general of Michigan.
Subject: Effect of Army appropriation bill on supplies to National Guard units.

1. The citizens of Grand Ledge have raised over $12,000 for the purpose of building stables and other buildings for Battery D, One hundred and nineteenth Field Artillery, Michigan National Guard.

2. Said body of citizens do not intend to erect said buildings unless horses and such equipment will be furnished the local unit.

3. In view of the present Army appropriation bill, there is some doubt in their minds as to whether horses can be furnished said local unit.

4. As the citizens of Grand Ledge are ready to commence the erection of stables and a riding hall, it is desired that they be informed as to whether horses will be furnished the local unit in view of said appropriation bill.

B. G. CAMERON,
Captain One hundred and nineteenth Field Artillery.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am as well aware as anyone that in order to lessen the burden of taxation which is now imposed upon the people we must reduce expenditures somewhere. I am also convinced of another thing. We are relying for the defense of our country after the cutting down of our Army largely upon the formation of the National Guard. Before the war there was no unit in my county. Now there are three, one in my home city, one in Grand Ledge, and one in Eaton Rapids. They are composed of the finest young men in the community. A number of them are former service men. They could be relied upon in any emergency.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the formation of the National Guard is the real safeguard to our country. When we are cutting down our Army we are losing our protection. With these units formed into the National Guard, we feel as safe as we did when we had a large Army.

The people are supporting these units. This letter is but an indication of what is transpiring the country over. The National Guard wants to know whether or not the Government is going to cut down the Army and then cut them out? We have provided for this troop. Now, by the appropriations we are going to be deprived of it. We are prepared to furnish our part of it with only a nominal expense to the country, but you do not propose to give them any support. If we are going to abandon our Army entirely, of course we must then dismiss these troops. But what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTON] has just stated and the kind of sentiment he has referred to makes us proud of our country. We are forming these guards without large expense to the taxpayers. Now, then, if that is true, why deprive the country of the use of such an Army in time of war?

Mr. SNYDER. I want to interpose in order to say that the gentleman is making exactly the same kind of a speech that I would make if I could get the time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for that.

My friends, there is not a Bolshevik, there is not a radical, there is not an anarchist, there is not a soviet but that wants every man discharged from the Army. They do not want an Army. What kind of a country will we have when these men are standing around on soap boxes committing treason? It is as bad for a man to stand on a soap box and say that this Government should be destroyed by force as it is for a man to take a gun and bear arms against his country. And I think the man that advises others to destroy our Government by force is as bad as the man who would do it with a gun. They are both enemies. [Applause.]

It would be a little easier for these evil-minded and evil-disposed persons to carry out their purpose and desire if we had no Army than it would if we had plenty of National Guards. This bill provides for 160,000 home troops. Intertwined with them are many ex-service men trained to the minute. They are all the flower of our land and all patriots. I do not like soviet propaganda or the kind of a government there is now in Russia.

Greece has a reserve army of 250,000. Switzerland has a reserve army of 260,000. And both countries together do not equal Michigan in area. Let us maintain our National Guard until the world settles down a bit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the House has cut down the Army in both enlisted men and officer personnel. It would be a mistake, in my judgment, to continue this policy and to further cut our Military Establishment by cutting down the necessary appropriation for the proper training and equipment of our National Guard.

During the late war many of our National Guard regiments were sent overseas, only to be there used as replacement troops. This may or may not have been necessary then, but if necessary, we then agreed that such steps should be taken as to prevent the necessity for such action in the future. As I understand it the newly organized Army will have National Guard units so equipped and organized as to fit in, and in the event of hostilities to immediately become a part of our active military forces, fit in every way for the first line of defense. As I understand it, this is the goal that those of us who are interested in a sound military policy have been striving for.

This has necessitated the forming of new tactical units in order to do this. My own State has one regiment of artillery which, since the war, has been motorized. Another regiment has been tentatively agreed upon but has not yet been organized. Other States have formed cavalry regiments. I understand that some States have formed, or have been requested to form, engineering units, and other strictly technical units.

The late war, with the advantages of modern science and twentieth century inventive genius, made possible the expanding of previous methods of making war and consequently developed many new technical branches of the service. These have come to stay; every modern military establishment must have them, and their usefulness ends if they are not kept up to date in every way. In carrying out this unified Army policy I understand that the War Department and our military leaders have felt that the development of these new branches of the service should proceed not only in the Regular Establishment but in the National Guard as well. The guard is so constituted as to make it possible to interest young men in these various new activities. This is especially true in the large cities, for a sufficient number of young men so interested in these various activities can be gathered together so as to develop real effective outfits, to be depended upon in the event of an emergency. If these are left to the Regular Establishment and our Regular Establishment is cut down, as this House has seen fit to cut it down, we will not have a properly balanced Army in the event of an emergency, and in time of war it would be too late to then organize, train, and equip these outfits.

I do not mean by this that every State should be authorized to have every possible kind of a technical unit; I do not feel that every State should have a tank corps, a chemical warfare division, an air force, and so forth; that is not necessary and would involve great expense. But where one or more of these can be organized and economically maintained in a State, it should be provided for if that sort of a unit would fit in well with an Army based upon a sound military policy. I have not any sympathy with the proposition that the National Guard should be practically restricted to infantry. I very much fear that if the policy proposed should be adhered to that that is what it will ultimately result in.

In my own city we have an Artillery regiment. It has been in existence for years. During the war it was the One hundred and fifty-first Field Artillery of the famous Rainbow Division. [Applause.] In that great combat division it rendered service second to none. Upon its return a goodly number of its officers and men, led by the man who commanded the regiment throughout the war, now the mayor of my city, reorganized the regiment and went back into the National Guard service. It now stands upon the rolls of the War Department as one of the most efficient outfits in the country. Horse artillery when the war broke out, it has since been motorized, and its officers now have under their control Government property and equipment amounting to $1,000,000. This equipment requires expert care and attention, and the War Department has authorized the hiring of several expert mechanics to care for this valuable equipment and to keep it in shape. I fear that if this reduction is made that this expert force may be decreased or done away with; if so, it will be a big mistake, and in the long run it would not be a measure of economy but one of extravagance and waste.

The headquarters company of this regiment is now fully equipped with a complete, up-to-date radio outfit. A portion of this they have furnished themselves. Its members are being trained in its use. An efficient regiment of Artillery to-day must have equipment of this character and its personnel must be trained in the use of that equipment. I personally know that officers and men of this regiment are putting in many hours every week because of their interest in their regiment and to aid in developing and maintaining an effective military establishment in this country.

This work should be encouraged. Yet to make this reduction is to give discouragement and to hamper these men in their efforts. I do not question but what there has been extravagance in the way this money has been handled from Washington. If this is the case, we ought to prevent a repetition of the extravagance by correcting the mistakes of administration, rather than cutting down the appropriation necessary to maintain these Artillery, Cavalry, and other technical units, which, in the event of an emergency, will take their place effectively in the Army that will then be necessary to protect our country. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to take just a few minutes in order to try to make plain the parliamentary situation in which we find ourselves.

The amendment which I offered at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] yesterday is thought by some of the Members who are interested in this subject a sufficient amount to take care of all the animals already issued to the National Guard, although I doubt that somewhat. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is the estimate proposed by the Militia Bureau for caring for something over 9,000 animals, which is about 1,000 in addition to what has been used, and which it is proposed to issue during the current year, owing to the increase of the guard and the acceptance of new units of Cavalry and Field Artillery.

Now, the situation is this: I shall support the Harrison amendment, but if the committee believes that we should only take care of the animals now in the possession of the National Guard units, I take it that they will support the amendment increasing this appropriation to $1,200,000 and strike out the proviso, which I would move to do in that case, which provides that no more than 4,000 animals shall be taken care of. Then I think the purposes for which we are contending will be met, because I have confidence enough in the subcommittee and in the chairman of the subcommittee to believe that when they meet in conference the Members from another body, the House having expressed itself clearly in favor of providing a sufficient sum for caring for the animals already issued to the National Guard, they could figure out to a mathematical certainty what amount of appropriation should be provided, and I believe that that can be done.

Now, if the House believes in extending the issue of horses, it should support the Harrison amendment, but if you believe in caring only for the number issued, support the amendment that was offered placing the amount at $1,200,000 and agree to strike out that proviso for caring for 4,000 horses.

This is the national policy. The National Guard has been absolutely forced, and you and I have been besieged for two years to get this thing or that thing done by the War Department, to enable the units of the National Guard to be recognized. They arbitrarily laid down their tables of organization. They compelled Infantry organizations in our State of Pennsylvania to disband and reorganize. One Infantry organization in Pittsburgh, which had been known ever since the Mexican War as the Duquesne Greys and later the Eighteenth Infantry, was forced to disband and to accept organization as a regiment of Field Artillery.

Now, having compelled these organizations of the National Guard to make these arbitrary changes, I submit it is not fair to cut this appropriation to such an extent as to deprive these organizations of animals that have already been issued to them. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to ask the chairman, who was absent when I introduced a letter here, whether it is the purpose of the committee to reduce these units so that they can not supply the batteries with the 32 horses that they have at the present time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I said it was necessary to supply the forage required for the National Guard. We hope, before we get through with it, to be able to work out some plan whereby they can reduce the number of animals. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the National Guard has not the full number of animals now to fully mount it. There are 12,000 mounted men now and 8,000 animals.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If these batteries are not going to get the horses they require, it is too bad. They have raised $12,000 in the city of Grand Ledge, where the Doorkeeper, Mr. Kennedy, lives, and are all ready and prepared to construct the required buildings.

Mr. ANTHONY. The War Department says that many of the States have built stables and storehouses for troops, batteries, and the tanks. It is a hardship on the States to do that. I do not believe they will take away from any of the States that have provided the facilities the animals or motors that they now have.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But from the statement the gentleman has made they are not warranted in putting up these buildings for these National Guard units?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is a direct answer to my question, and is what I want to know.

Mr. CRAGO. This legislation would compel them to take away half of these animals?

Mr. ANTHONY. I said we hoped, before this bill becomes a law, to provide for them; but otherwise, if the War Department has reached no conclusion, it can run wild.

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think it is proposed to do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], you are running exactly counter to the present opinion, and the well thought out opinion, of the Secretary of War; you are running counter to the opinion of the head of the Militia Bureau, who in his testimony before our committee stated that the number of Cavalry compared with the number of Infantry is out of all proportion.

Are you going to allow the head of the Militia Bureau to run counter to the opinion of the Secretary of War, when the chairman of the committee promises here that this matter, which is now undergoing readjustment, will receive thorough consideration in conference and that it will be the disposition of the committee to work out a plan that will harmonize with the views of the Secretary of War?

The technical heads of the Army also approve of the policy of the Secretary of War in taking away these highly technical units from the National Guard. We do not seek to restrict the use of cavalry in the Army of the United States. We have not reduced one iota the forage appropriation for the horses connected with the cavalry, yet there is a difference of opinion in military circles as to whether cavalry is as much needed now as it was in prior times.

If you are going to let Members from home districts, who are not acquainted with the big problems that are confronting the War Departemnt, to come here and urge a doubling of appropriations, when the country from coast to coast is demanding economy, you will have before you a pork barrel proposition that will become a scandal as the years go on.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield now. There has been no disposition anywhere to curtail the proper activities of the National Guard, but we want to develop that activity along the line of economy and efficiency and in accordance with a well-thought-out program of military endeavor. The State of New Jersey had only one cavalry organization prior to the present organization of the National Guard. The State of Wisconsin had only one battery.

And now we find little communities asking for the establishment of these technical units, out of all proportion to a well-balanced Army, so that even the Chief of the Military Bureau admits it. If you are going to be carried off your feet by doubling the appropriation against the committee that is trying to act in harmony with a well-adjusted plan, and in harmony with the spirit of economy that is abroad in the country, you are going counter to the development of that plan. I hope that as the House has backed up the judgment of the committee in the past, it will back up the judgment of the committee in this particular, because we do not want to do that which is not for the interest and welfare of the country. I ask for a vote.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is ill-timed. He proposes to increase the number of horses for the National Guard more than 1,000. His amendment even calls for more than 9,200 horses for the National Guard. In my judgment, the National Guard of the United States ought to be confined to infantry and machine guns. If this wild policy is kept up of placing all of these units in the National Guard, where will the expense go to? The States will not be able to maintain a National Guard on such an expensive scale. They can not afford to pay for great barns full of horses and for the necessary feed and for the stableboys to take care of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HARRISON. If we are going to have technical units in the National Guard, ought we not to have all those that are necessary for its proper organization?

Mr. QUIN. I can not agree with the gentleman. If you are going to have all the different things that would make an ideal allocation of all these units in the National Guard, the poor States of this Union will be unable to maintain their pro rata of the National Guard. We ought to stand by this committee in this provision that they have brought forth here. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] was correct, they could have airplane squadrons in the National Guard, and chemical warfare squadrons, and the great military organization that would be carried out would be a burden and would destroy the National Guard. Why, the State of Mississippi, which I have the honor to represent in part, would be unable to maintain a National Guard.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not the time. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Ninety per cent of the States of this Union would be unable to maintain all of these expensive units. Then why not let us restrict this as far as possible to the men who have guns in their hands? The National Guard are not presumed to fly in the air. They are not presumed to go up in dirigibles, they are not presumed to get astraddle of horses. Why, think of the National Guard in a little State like Kansas over here, or Mississippi or Alabama, having hundreds of horses to maintain and support and all the expense of airships. You know that it is but an indirect method of destroying the National Guard, and if there is one branch of the Military Establishment that should be kept up it is the National Guard, the best part of the Army, that the people in every State can rely on to take care of any emergency. Instead of having all this great expense that would break it down, let it be a National Guard of infantrymen. That is what we need. Men with rifles in their hands and a few machine guns can take care of any situation in the States. Then why break it down so that the State legislature can not afford to appropriate the natural part that a State ought to bear and has to bear under the Constitution?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 45, noes 46.

Mr. CRAGO and Mr. SMITH of Michigan asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. CRAGO.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 56.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. CRAGO was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, after this expression of the attitude of the Committee of the Whole I think the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ANTHONY] will not object to striking out the language of the proviso beginning in line 25, on page 79, which is to the effect that not more than 4,000 animals can be cared for under this appropriation.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is still the opinion of the subcommittee that we ought to limit it to that number. Of course, if the gentleman and the House want to turn these National Guard appropriations into a pork barrel, I presume the committee will have to obey the will of the House.

Mr. CRAGO. I think that is hardly a fair statement.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes; the gentleman knows that this vote is the result of propaganda sent out, and these votes come from the influence of the local National Guard organizations.

Mr. CRAGO. Should we not listen to them?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; we should not listen to them entirely. We should economize the expenditure of the people's money wherever possible and use our own best judgment.

Mr. CRAGO. We now have in all of the National Guard units 8,000 animals, and by the adoption of this amendment we have provided what we think will pay for forage for them. As there is a limitation in this proviso confining them to 4,000 animals, which is only half the number already issued, I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 25, page 79, and ending in line 2, on page 80.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAGO: Page 79, line 25, strike out the proviso beginning in line 25 and ending in line 2, page 80.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, there are over 12,000 men in the cavalry organizations of the National Guard to-day, but there are only 8,000 animals issued, all told, both to the artillery and cavalry organizations. I do not believe the cavalry organizations have over 4,000 animals. I am informed that they have not that many.

Without some kind of a limitation on the number of animals it would be possible to issue for the Army, or for the National Guard, if the Army could issue all the animals it wanted to to the National Guard, they could unload animals on the National Guard to be cared for. The committee believes that in the present state of lack of a new plan for the organization of the National Guard and the intention of the War Department to change the present organization there should be some limit of the number of animals, unless the House wants to leave it wide open.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Would not the gentleman agree that the number that could be issued would be limited by the amount appropriated? We have increased the appropriation only $200,000, and would not that limit the number issued? I do not want to see the thing run wild.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have stated what I think is going to happen. I think the War Department will take a number of the animals away from the National Guard and replace them by motors.

Mr. CRAGO. I believe in that policy.

Mr. ANTHONY. If you do not need the money appropriated, I think the House has gone ahead blindly.

Mr. CRAGO. If we keep the number of animals we have——

Mr. ANTHONY. The War Department may take away a number of them, as I say, and replace them by motors.

Mr. CRAGO. They will have to provide the motorization for the number of units, and all we ask is that the limitation be taken off, that only 4,000 should be appropriated for.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Would not it be perfectly absurd to provide for 8,000 animals, as at present in the guard, and then provide that you could not have but 4,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree that it is perfectly absurd to provide a great amount of money for forage when the War Department has just told us in a letter from the Secretary of War that it is going to organize a board to reconsider the tables of organization.

Mr. HULL. They are not going to demobilize any units.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; but they may change them into some other type of organization.

Mr. HULL. They have the animals and have provided for the animals in the organization.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it does not necessarily follow that because you increase the feed for the animals that you want to provide for more than 4,000 animals. But if this should be the logic of the House, to carry out what you have done to its logical conclusion in reference to the National Guard, you ought to increase the other units so that it will amount to something like $10,000,000. I will tell you what you have done. Certain pet places in the country where a good many young men are members of wealthy organizations, Cavalry units, because they want it, you propose to appropriate the amount of money necessary to keep that organization going. You can not have a general Cavalry unit organized as a National Guard in each of the States without, in my judgment, creating such an expense as to destroy the National Guard in the minds of the taxpayers, because if they are going to pay that much money to keep up the National Guard men in the National Guard, they would infinitely rather take all of the man's time and put him in the standing Army. Therefore, you are creating a method of destroying the National Guard. Now, if this is your position, then you ought to have followed it to the logical conclusion with all the tactical units—the Tank Corps, the Chemical Warfare Corps, and all those—and the result would be that if this is done you have a harmonious Army in the present National Guard, and it will cost you half a billion dollars.

Now, I want also to ask you people whether or not if this vote had been taken a few days ago you would have voted as you now have. I know the adjutants general over the country have got busy. I do not know how many telegrams you have received, but I know the propaganda has been going on. The adjutant general of my State imagines that the whole country is rising up because you are doing something to the National Guard.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the State will furnish a large part of the expenses of maintaining the National Guard, does not the gentleman think the Government could furnish a little?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely; but they want the Government to furnish the horses and furnish the care for them. Why, I can get you 2,000,000 National Guard men if you will let the Government furnish the horses and the feed, and furnish the care for the animals and saddle them and bring them to the boys. You need not talk about what the States will furnish. In my State every boy from 16 years old up will join the National Guard if you will furnish him the horse, feed the horse, care for the horse, and bring it to him. [Laughter.] That is what they want the States to furnish.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will to my distinguished friend, one of the officers here who has gotten to be strong for a big Army.

Mr. HILL. One of the purposes of training the Cavalry and Field Artillery in the National Guard is to teach them to saddle and to curry horses.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, I know what the purpose is as well as the gentleman does. A man does not have to serve as a colonel or a major or a captain in the Army to know the purpose of these things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. I do not have to go to a man who has worn the uniform to tell me about those things, but if one would listen to them here one would imagine that the only man who has one particle of judgment about what sort of an army or a navy we need is an officer. You let a fellow serve for three or four months in the State militia or in the Army, and he comes back here and poses as an expert on military matters. When one of these privates will come up here who served over in France all of the time as a private and begins to tell me about something, then I will listen to him, or if he goes down into my district and begins to run for office against me, I get uneasy; but I am not uneasy about the captains, nor the majors, nor the lieutenants, nor the colonels who run against me—these officers who pose as being mighty experts on military affairs. I am not afraid of them politically. If a man gets above the grade of colonel, then, if he carries his own precinct, it will be on account of home pride. I have always been a consistent advocate of the National Guard. As I said before, when I addressed the House on this subject, I do not care how large you make the National Guard as long as you confine it to Infantry units and will drill the men for service, but I am opposed to the creation of these technical units that mean that the taxpayers can not bear the burden, and in order that the taxpayers may know how we stand on this proposition I only ask that one-fifth of the membership of this House will stand up with me and demand a record vote upon the amendment which has just been placed on this bill. I want the record to show, because the Constitution provided that when one-fifth of the Members present demand that the constituents back home shall learn how we vote, men must go on record, and that should be done now, especially when we are staggering under the burden of taxation that we are.

If there ever was a time when you could have saved several million dollars if you carry what you have done to its logical conclusion, that time is now, and you could have rendered a great service and a great benefit to the country. If you want to vote for more than 4,000 horses, very well. We have tried as a committee to get rid of the surplus horses. We have made an effort to have them sell the horses. If the gentlemen could see the bills that they render for the forty-odd thousand surplus horses they had, running into the millions of dollars, keeping them off the market, keeping men to care for them, they would begin to understand why it is that military matters are so expensive, and gentlemen will understand why it is that the fathers of the Republic were afraid of military matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, you have just voted to provide forage for 8,000 horses for the use of the Field Artillery and Cavalry of the National Guard. You are now asked to remove from the bill the limitation that there shall not be more than 4,000 horses to be fed by the appropriation providing for 8,000. You have already decided that you want 8,000 horses issued to the National Guard. As a logical consequence you can not fail to remove the provision of the bill by which you limit those horses to 4,000. The distinguished gentleman who has just spoken, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], I think, makes a mistake in the attitude of his speech. He obviously thinks that we who advocate an efficient National Guard are playing politics. His speech would do him credit upon the stump at home, but I say to you that I take my opinion on this horse question from a very distinguished Democrat, although I am a Republican. I take my opinion from a man who started out as a private in the Maryland National Guard and who served as a colonel north of Verdun in 1918. I know that it is almost a disgrace in the minds of some gentlemen in this House for a man to have worn the uniform of an officer in the past war, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he thinks officers who served the Government in this last war were so utterly vicious, why it is that we combed the divisions to pick out the best enlisted men to make officers of them?

Mr. SISSON. I understand the gentleman was decorated with the croix de guerre.

Mr. HILL. I prefer not to discuss my military record.

Mr. SISSON. And I understand that the gentleman was one of those men who never fired a gun.

Mr. HILL. I fired a pistol at enemy troops a good many times north of Verdun. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not here to discuss my war record. I have never mentioned my war record, and I do not want to do it. It is very bad taste for any officer to refer to it, but what I want to say to the gentleman is this——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. When, in the history of any war, did any officer fire a gun or when was he expected to fire a gun?

Mr. HILL. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Army equipped officers with Army automatic pistols, and we did not have guns except in the Infantry.

Mr. SISSON. What branch of the Army did the gentleman serve in?

Mr. HILL. I would rather not discuss my service.

Mr. SISSON. Was it a fighting corps that the gentleman served in?

Mr. HILL. I was combat liaison officer in the fighting north of Verdun, if the gentleman knows what that is. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I did not intend to make this a personal matter at all. The gentleman injected personalities into it.

Mr. HILL. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I ask a personal privilege of this House. I never said a word about my service in the war until the gentleman got up and started it.

Mr. SISSON. But the gentleman discussed me personally about what I would say in my district. Now, I want to say to my friend that at any time he wants to make this a personal matter nothing will be more acceptable to me, except that I do not want the matter pulled off in the presence of the House and therefore be in contempt of the House, because I want to say to my friend——

Mr. GALLIVAN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maryland yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HILL. I have yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. I would say to the gentleman from Maryland that there was nothing further from my mind in the beginning of this debate than to make it personal, but when the gentleman assails me and my motives, talking about its being a nice thing to talk about down in my district, I want to say that I do not make one speech here and another in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes additional?

Mr. SISSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Gentlemen of the committee, it is very embarrassing for me to say what I am about to say. I have talked on military matters in this House because since 1904, when I enlisted as a private in an Artillery battery, I have tried to do what I could for the national defense, and I have never referred to any war service of mine on the floor of this House. I did not come here to speak personalities. I came here to advocate a decent national defense from the views of men who have had experience. The letter I have in my hand is one which was sent to me by the adjutant general of Maryland. They used to call the National Guard "tin soldiers." We bore that. They used to laugh at us before the war. We bore that. But this adjutant general of Maryland started out as a private and he carried your troops through the fighting north of Verdun in October, 1918. He is a Democrat. I am a Republican. The gentleman who spoke before said that he would rather have the judgment of a private than he would of any officer. He said that men who wore an officer's uniform and reached the grade of captain in the past war came here and posed as experts. Now, gentlemen, that is all I have said. There has never been any word I have said on the floor of the House to lead anybody to know I had ever seen service. [Applause.] The gentleman gets up here and wants to make you think I am here boasting of my service, or he is trying to discredit it. He asked what arm I served in. I do not care to discuss these things, but I am perfectly willing to have the gentleman look at the record of my service in the War Department. As a matter of fact, I will say to the gentleman that one of the reasons why I am in this House is because my predecessor for some foolish reason attacked my war record without knowing what he was talking about, and that beat him. I did not raise any personal issue with the gentleman from Mississippi, for I believe he stands for what he believes in. What I said was this: I said to the gentleman that on the floor in the past few days I have listened without any word of criticism to repeated statements here which make it appear that it is discreditable for any member of this body to have been in the past war. [Applause.] Why, the gentleman said that he would rather have the judgment of a private—that he was only afraid of privates politically—than an officer, and I ask him why we combed the Regular Army to get men who are capable of being officers?

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. SISSON. I want to state to the gentleman from Maryland that I have no desire in any wise to reflect upon an officer or his record in the Army. My discussion of the position of officers here on the floor sometimes have been more in jest than otherwise, and I have noticed and noted that the speeches made by those men who served in the Army have been for these large appropriations. Now, the statement that I made about the privates to the effect I was not uneasy if an officer ran against me but I was if a private, was also said largely in a matter of jest, without any desire to reflect upon any officer who had served his country and done his duty. I am also glad my friend from Maryland does not mean anything personal by his statement, and if I have misinterpreted the gentleman's motives, why I am sorry I did so. I think it is due that I should make that statement [applause], because it is not my purpose to reflect upon any man's position in this House personally; and if the gentleman has no desire to reflect upon my position personally, if I have done or said anything that offends the gentleman from Maryland, I am sorry for it. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make my position clear before I ask for a vote on this amendment. The reason why we have stood, some of us, for well-trained officers is that on the experience and training of the National Guard officer and your Regular officer and your Reserve Corps officer depends the health and the life of the enlisted men who must do the actual fighting. Now, gentlemen, I want to ask you one more thing. You have already fixed the appropriation for forage for animals in the National Guard at a sufficient amount to give 8,000 animals. I ask you to remove the provision here that limits them to 4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee resists the striking out of this provision, notwithstanding the vote of the committee a few moments ago increasing the sum by more than $200,000, because we believe in the limitation of the number of horses that should be paid for out of this amount. This is not the last time when this question will be presented for consideration of the House of Representatives. The subcommittee believes there should be some limit and restriction of the activities in consonance with the policy enunciated by the Secretary of War and called to your attention by the chairman of the committee, who is now planning, with the aid of the Chief of Staff, a readjustment and rearrangement of these tactical units of the National Guard. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were— ayes 62, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of help for care of matériel, animals, and equipment, $750,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question and call his attention to the fact that there is only $750,000 provided for the care of these animals. I take it for granted in conference, if the conferees decide to provide more animals, there will be no trouble in arranging so this will be a proper amount.

Mr. MANN. That is only $750,000 for the care of the animals?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is to provide outside men to take care of the animals in order that the National Guard may ride them?

Mr. CRAGO. It does provide for caretakers in some instances, but I am only calling attention to the fact that necessarily this should be somewhat increased.

Mr. MANN. But this is only for the care of the help to take care of the animals?

Mr. CRAGO. And matériel, animals, and equipment.

Mr. MANN. For the compensation of help for care——

Mr. CRAGO. Of matériel, animals, and equipment.

Mr. MANN. But this is only to pay for the help?

Mr. CRAGO. That is correct, and if they decide the men themselves should do more of this work that is a sufficient sum.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How much of a cut is this from the estimate?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is less than half of what they want. Under the present system of the War Department, with every mounted organization they allow the salary of five civilian caretakers for the horses; with every tank company or technical unit, where there is machinery, they allow the pay of five civilian mechanics. Under the amount asked for by the War Department they want to provide for 14 tank units at $410 a month for mechanics to care for them. They now have 11 of such units, as I understand it, in the service. And they issue 14 big tanks to each one of those units. They also provide for 14 regiments of motorized howitzers, which is a large type of field gun. They now have 6 in organization. The committee thought that it would be inadvisable to organize any more of these expensive tank units in the guard; that those are functions the Regular Army should take care of.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have not any idea of disagreeing with the committee on that. The thing I am interested in is that the committee did not discontinue or curtail the work of units that are already in existence.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman, if I had my way about it, I would wipe out every tank unit in the guard. They have no business there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman further. It is necessary, of course, that these motorized units of Artillery should have some mechanics, who put in all or part of their time in the guard, which is absolutely essential?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I presume it is thought that as long as we have the money in the Treasury we ought to shovel it out.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. We have thousands of dollars of equipment which ought to be cared for. I am wondering whether it is the purpose of the gentlemen on the committee to discontinue these men who are putting in their time and who are caring for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not all of them. We intend to provide for about half of the program the War Department outlines.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And that includes this additional program?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. As I explained, of the 14 tank units proposed there are 11 organized now, and of the 14 howitzer organizations there are 6 of them organized now, and our desire was to not expand those units any further.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There is a million dollars' worth of property out in our own armory that must be cared for.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is a part of the game, I am afraid, that they are trying to unload on the States the caring for much of the surplus property we got from the war. The gentleman wants to bear in mind that with the organization of every Artillery unit in some country towns they ship the unit 19 carloads of supplies that it has to take care of.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman contend the Artillery unit is something that they ought not to provide?

Mr. ANTHONY. They ought not to have such an unnecessary large amount of that stuff shipped to them.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have sufficient confidence in the gentleman and his discriminating ability that if he will come out and see this particular unit that I have referred to, he will not have any criticism to offer.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have four or five of them in my district, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman is fortunate.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses, camps of instruction, $6,500,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$8,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAGO: Page 80, line 5, strike out the figures "$6,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$8,000,000."

Mr. CRAGO. I do this notwithstanding the fact that the Chief of the Militia Bureau asks for an appropriation there of $9,500,000, which is $1,500,000 more.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman is mistaken. He asked for $8,000,000.

Mr. CRAGO. I was going to explain. But the War Department and, as I understand, the Budget Bureau, recommended only the $8,000,000, and in support of the necessity for some amendment along this line, I want to call attention to the fact that this $6,500,000 provided will, under the figures furnished by the Militia Bureau, only provide for the going into camp the coming summer of 115,000 men.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we can convince the gentleman that that is an ample sum which is provided.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman means——

Mr. ANTHONY. That this $6,500,000 is an ample sum.

Mr. CRAGO. To send to camp all the present Organized Militia?

Mr. ANTHONY. All the men that are in organizations that will report. The Militia Bureau bases its estimate on the fact that they expected every man to report for summer training. In our investigation we found out—and this appropriation is $500,000 more than last year—that only 66⅔ per cent of the National Guard reports at this summer period of training.

Our estimate is based on allowing about 80 per cent to report. Now, it is a dead moral certainty, in my opinion, that you will not get 100 per cent of the National Guard to report at these camps.

Mr. CRAGO. But you would get 100 per cent of the units.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but not of the members.

Mr. CRAGO. The reason why a larger percentage did not report in camp last year is that the adjutants general of the different States were confronted with the fact that there was not sufficient appropriation to take care of them all.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was $200,000 left over out of the appropriation that we made for that purpose last year.

Mr. CRAGO. But since that time the gentleman will admit that the guard has been increased, and additional units have been mustered into the service, and we have to-day 140,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman know or have any assurance that more than 60 per cent will appear and report for duty in camp in the coming year?

Mr. CRAGO. Many of the companies have a minimum of only 50, although they were required by the tables of organization to have 65 in a company unit.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman think that if we appropriate the full maximum amount for the National Guard it is a dead certainty that it will not be used?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. That is the reason why I cut this estimate from $9,500,000 to $8,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is in accordance with what has been recommended by the Secretary of War and recommended by the Budget Bureau.

Mr. CRAGO. The Secretary of War was very liberal.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what we are following.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] will not be adopted.

It is all very well to stand here and advocate large appropriations for increased activities in every branch of the Government, but we must realize that the time has come when we must give serious consideration to the needs of the people of the United States and to the needs of the Treasury.

What is the use of trying to give consideration to the problems that are before the Nation when, after having given consideration to those problems and bringing the best judgment that can be brought to bear upon the subject and after that having reached conclusions, we then have, without any consideration whatever, amendments offered to increase by millions items that are recommended by the committee?

I do not believe the country will sustain any such attitude on the part of Members. We ought to give serious consideration to the needs of the taxpayers. The National Guard is not being discriminated against. Every needful provision for their training is made in the items offered for your consideration by the Committee on Appropriations. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania assume to say that without any consideration whatever he knows more about the needs of this service than those men who have been sitting for 90 days and giving earnest and serious consideration to every phase of the problem? What is the use of talking economy and then practicing extravagance? [Applause.]

If any single Member upon the floor of the House can override the recommendations that have been given serious consideration, when there is no justification whatever for the recommendation that he makes, what is the use of our bringing recommendations in here? We believe that we represent in our recommendations the best thought of the men in the military service who have given attention to this subject, and there is not a man on the Committee on Appropriations that seeks to destroy either the efficiency of the Military Establishment or the National Guard. We are as much interested in the efficiency of these arms of the Government as anybody else.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not yield.

We come to you seriously recommending decent economy, while we come also recommending decent service. The demand of America to-day is for economy. Assume the responsibility of overriding that demand, and then go before the people and apologize for it.

We are here to accord as far as we can with the sentiment of the American people, and while we are endeavoring to accord with that sentiment we are bringing to you for your consideration problems thoroughly digested, with the assertion on the part of this committee, without fear of successful contradiction, that the recommendations that we make in this particular are adequate to every need, and there will be no let-up or slack-up on the training that can be given under the recommended appropriation of $6,500,000. I hope that the committee will agree with the Committee on Appropriations and not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania increasing that amount from $6,500,000 to $8,000,000. [Applause.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to a most extraordinary proposition from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. According to what he says, because three men constituting the majority members of a subcommittee of five members of the Committee on Appropriations have brought in here a bill of 133 pages——

Mr. MADDEN. I deny that. There are 35 men on this committee, and they have all passed on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I can not yield. I repeat what I said, Mr. Chairman, because it is well known that the recommendations of these subcommittees, after very little consideration, are adopted practically unanimously by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman mean to imply that these recommendations are brought in here without consideration?

Mr. DALLINGER. Not at all. I am simply stating that the gentleman from Illinois has made the astounding proposition that because three men, or five men, if we assume that the minority members of the subcommittee have exercised their full share in the work of preparation, Members of this House, have brought in this bill with all these items, this House should accept it, regardless of the facts of the case, regardless of the wishes of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army, and regardless of the advice of the Secretary of War and his experts. Mr. Chairman, what are we here for? [Applause.] What are we sitting for in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? Why not have the bill as drawn by the Committee on Appropriations sent directly to the Senate, passed by that body without change, and then sent to the President of the United States for his signature? As I understand it, we are in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DALLINGER. I decline to yield.

We should, of course, give due weight to the recommendations of the committee; but if we find, as we have found from National and State officials and from patriotic men in different parts of this country who have fought overseas and are now trying to do something to build up the National Guard, that this absolute refusal of the Committee on Appropriations to carry out the recommendations of the War Department will seriously cripple and handicap the National Guard, it is the patriotic duty of the members of this Committee of the Whole House to differ with the Committee on Appropriations and to offer and support appropriate and necessary amendments. That is why, under the rules of the House, the House resolves itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an appropriation bill like the one now before us.

If the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is correct, we are wasting our time; we should accept this bill in toto without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i" and not spend time here in going over these items. I recognize the fact that the Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is chairman has worked hard. The members of that committee have gone into this matter exhaustively, and they are entitled to credit for what they have done; but we are not compelled to accept their judgment on questions of policy, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], who has had long experience in the National Guard and as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, can make out a good case, as he did a minute ago when he succeeded in securing the adoption of an amendment increasing the appropriation for the forage of Cavalry and Artillery horses at the bottom of page 79, this Committee of the Whole House should give heed to the facts and arguments presented by him and act accordingly. Otherwise, as I said before, we are wasting our time and ought to accept these bills as they are reported from the committee and read by the Clerk, and send them to the Senate and the President without spending our time at the expense of the people of the United States in discussing amendments in Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, just one word. I have no criticism of the argument for economy, but I want to say to you that I do not care to face the members of the National Guard of my State, and I do not believe you want to face the members of the National Guard of your different States, when the word goes out from the adjutant general of your State that he can invite only a certain part of the National Guard into camp this year because Congress refused to appropriate a sufficient amount to allow all of the National Guard units to be invited to go into camp. We have here the recommendation of the Secretary of War for this appropriation of $8,000,000, and we have the recommendation of the chief of the Militia Bureau for $9,500,000. I have taken the figures of the Secretary of War, thinking that perhaps the chief of the Militia Bureau might have been too optimistic in his view of the number of men who would go into the National Guard before the time comes for the summer training camps; but the amount appropriated here will not enable the Government to offer training to the men whom we already have in uniform. We had better have a small balance unexpended than not be able to say to the governors of the different States that they can offer this summer training to all of the National Guard units of each State. That is all I have to say on that. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I was reluctant to vote for the last amendment until I heard the effective speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], which compelled me to side with my colleague from Maryland [Mr. HILL]. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I am whole-heartedly in favor of this amendment now before the House. The question boils down to this: What is to be our policy of national defense for this country? Are we going to reduce the Army and keep reducing the Army, and then not provide adequately for the National Guard? Last year I helped with others to reduce the Army to 150,000, and advocated that course of action because I knew that the National Guard, which was then less than 100,000 men, was rapidly increasing, and, as we predicted, has increased to over 150,000. Even the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. ANTHONY] agrees that the National Guard will amount to 160,000 by the 1st of July, the beginning of the new fiscal year. The subcommittee have provided for encampment expenses for only 115,000, and we should provide for a mean average of at least 144,000 National Guard men. I take it we are all agreed on the policy that every National Guard soldier should be provided with at least two weeks' training during the year. That is the policy that was laid down June 4, 1920, in the Army reorganization act. For the past two years the policy laid down in that act of June 4, 1920, has been revised, amended, and almost kicked into a cocked hat; but we must decide here to-day whether or not we are to have a definite policy of national defense or whether we are to continue to pursue a conflicting and vacillating policy which promises to maintain the efficiency and training of the guard, but in reality does not provide for anything like two weeks' training for the number of men now in our federalized National Guard. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like some information which we have not yet obtained. Will the amount carried in the bill, $6,500,000, pay the expenses of camps of instruction for the militia forces that we now have enrolled?

Mr. FISH. It certainly will not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman give his authority for that statement?

Mr. FISH. Certainly. I hold the authority in my hand, the statements of the Assistant Secretary of War and of the Chief of the Militia Bureau, both of whom I presume we may call experts. The appropriation is sufficient for only 115,000 men. The chairman of the subcommittee states that we will have in the National Guard 160,000 men by the 1st of July, the beginning of the next fiscal year. Yet we are providing funds for only 115,000 for encampment purposes. Does that answer the question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. So that if the appropriation is only $6,500,000 some of the militia forces will be unable to take this training?

Mr. FISH. Yes. I differ with the chairman of the subcommittee as to the number, but I should say approximately 25,000 will be unable to take that training.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to emphasize the fact that we should decide now whether we are to have a definite military policy, whether we are going to back the guard and provide sufficient funds to enable every member of the guard to have two weeks' training, or whether we shall mistakenly economize and say that only a certain percentage of the guard shall have this training. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to repeat unnecessarily the statements that I have made heretofore, but my distinguished friends who are advocating the increase in this appropriation—and they are all men whom I respect very highly, Colonel CRAGO, Colonel HILL, and Colonel FISH—are used to commanding troops that always report for duty when they are ordered to do so, but in the case of the National Guard at these annual maneuvers, many of them are unable to take this summer training. They are engaged in business and are unable to report with their organization.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Does not the gentleman think it is the part of the wisdom, however, for us to appropriate a sufficient amount so that the adjutant general of each State can say to all of his units, "You can attend these encampments," and have a surplus, rather than to make an appropriation based on a certain percentage of individuals not showing up, which would be taken as an excuse for not offering training to all the units?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that if he ran his individual business that way, and made allocations of money and capital far in excess of what was necessary to carry on that individual activity, he would go broke in a very short time, and so would this Government if we made appropriations in that way.

Mr. CRAGO. Not only have all the troops to be asked——

Mr. ANTHONY. They will all be asked.

Mr. CRAGO. Not if you cut down this appropriation.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, if the gentleman will allow me—I can not yield further—the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] said that the amount would not be sufficient to train the number of men reporting for duty. As I explained to the House, only about 66⅔ per cent reported for duty last year. Basing the strength on a National Guard of 150,000, and suppose we put it as high as 70 per cent that will report for duty, a number far in excess of that which is reported heretofore, that only means a little more than 105,000 men. Now, we are allowing sufficient appropriation for 120,000 or 125,000 men, and I do not believe that number will report at the camps. As I stated a moment ago, of the $6,000,000 appropriated last year $200,000 is unexpended. We want to take care of every member of the guard that wants training, and I believe there will be money enough to do it and some left over. If the House wants to appropriate eight or nine million dollars, why, they can do it and have the surplus left.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman's estimate of the number who would be kept at home should turn out to be wrong, then it is too late to correct it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, the gentleman knows there is not a National Guard in the country but that has a number of men who by their business can not take the training; that they can not leave home.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the effort is put forth to get the men into the camps, and if the appropriation involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is adopted and they can not get them, the money is left in the Treasury; it is not expended.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; but if it is appropriated another body may put in a proviso to make all of these appropriations interchangeable, and if you vote $2,000,000 extra it is very likely to be expended.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have sufficient confidence——

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman's confidence is not justified by past experience.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Were all of the National Guard units given training last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not only was there a sufficient appropriation to take care of all that reported for training last year, but there is $200,000 left.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The gentleman has no doubt that all will be called and given an opportunity for training this year?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not the slightest doubt that that is so, and if it can be shown that the fund would be needed higher than the past year we would willingly provide the money.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. How many reported for training last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not state exactly.

Mr. HULL. I would like to ask the gentleman how many National Guard men were sent to the camps last summer?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have just stated to the gentleman from Iowa that I did not know the number, but 66⅔ per cent was present.

Mr. HULL. That is, 66⅔ of the present strength of the units, but not the strength of the guard. The gentleman is mistaken. There was less than 10 per cent that failed to go, and there is the trouble, that the gentleman's figures take the strength of the units.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not base the number on the strength of the units. There was 66⅔ present at the training camps.

Mr. HULL. There was less than 10 per cent absent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the gentleman knows anything about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does not the gentleman say 1 per cent instead of 10?

Mr. HULL. As a matter of fact, you are not providing in this bill for a number in excess of 115,000. You are going to have on the 1st of July 160,000 in the National Guard, and unless this appropriation is increased, at least 40,000 guardsmen can not be at the camps. When you do that, you destroy the guard to a large extent.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I have been listening to the discussion with much interest. The appropriation last year was $6,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Every man in the National Guard was offered training.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. At the end there was $200,000 left.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And this year you are appropriating $6,500,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, I want to know how much greater demand there will be on the part of the National Guard men this year than there was last year?

Mr. HULL. The National Guard has increased about 50 per cent in one year.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, the gentleman is not correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is hyperbole.

Mr. HULL. There were 97,000 a year ago and it will be 160,000 by the 1st of July.

Mr. ANTHONY. There will not be 160,000.

Mr. HULL. There will be more than 160,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is very enthusiastic.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked why we should appropriate $500,000 more this year than we did last year. Last year we appropriated $6,000,000 to take care of the National Guard encampments.

This bill provides for $6,500,000. That in itself answers our case, because the guard has increased more than 50 per cent. Last year at this time the federalized guard numbered less than 100,000; by July 1 it will be 160,000. A proportionate increase to provide two weeks' encampment for all National Guard troops would require an appropriation of $10,000,000, but we are only asking for $8,000,000, which should be the minimum.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. With pleasure.

Mr. ANTHONY. General Rickards states in the hearings that at training time the guard numbered 114,000; so that we have all been mistaken.

Mr. FISH. And this year it is admitted that it will be 160,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman know how many availed themselves of this training last year?

Mr. HULL. Ninety-seven thousand last year, at the 1st of July.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Who went into training?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no. I do not know the exact number—nobody seems to know that—but there were 97,000 on the 1st of July, and when training time came there were 114,000. Today you admit that there will be 160,000 in the guard on the 1st of July, and yet you are providing for only 115,000. The guard will increase 25 per cent from the 1st of July to the time it is sent to camp.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to prolong the debate, but I want to say that I am for this amendment because, in the language of the early settlers, while we pray I believe in keeping our powder dry. When we began taking the young men into the Army during the last war it was found that many of the men were physically unfit. One of the strong arguments at that time was that we ought to give our young men military training if for no other reason than for physical reasons. I believe the young men of this country, so far as we are able to do it, ought to be given a chance for military training. They ought to be brought up in such a way that if their services are called for they will be prepared to undertake the duties assigned to them. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] argued that we ought to follow the advice of the Secretary of War in reference to the increase of the Cavalry. The gentleman did not say, however, that he did not follow the advice of the Secretary of War in regard to the size of the Army. It seems to me if we are going to put the Army down to 115,000 enlisted men we ought at least to provide for men in the event of another war, and the best way to do it is to educate and give military training to the young men of the country. It will not only give them a chance in a military way but it will give them certain healthful recreation. They will be examined, and it will be a guide for their course in the future and will be of great benefit to them physically.

In view of the fact that the National Guard will be increased this year from 100,000 to 160,000 men, certainly $8,000,000 will not be too much for that increase. I think it will be money well expended. The people do not want a large Army, but they do want the young men of the country in the National Guard given a chance for military training. At least, that is the way they feel in the State of Maryland.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment. I find that the bill already carries $6,500,000 for this particular purpose. The entire Army appropriation bill that we have before us carries $270,000,000. That is a very considerable amount of money and is very much more money than we spent on the Military Establishment prior to the war. I am opposed to increasing these appropriations for two reasons: First, we already are forewarned that there will not only not be any surplus in the Government revenues for the next fiscal year, but there will be a deficit, and if the $200,000,000 decline in the income and excess-profits tax collections for this year, 1922, materialize, there will be $200,000,000 more of deficit than has been previously predicted; second, I am opposed to increasing this particular provision because we all know that the usual result is, if the House appropriates, say, $250,000,000 for the Military Establishment, when the bill goes to the Senate that legislative body invariably increases it. If we were to take up all of these War Department recommendations and write them into the bill and send the bill over to the Senate with an appropriation of $300,000,000, I have no doubt that it would come back to the House with a very substantial increase. I think therefore we will do well to follow the figures that the committee has agreed upon and defeat this amendment. In opposing the pending amendment I do not do so because of any lack of appreciation and regard for the National Guard. I think it is of a high value as an integral part of our national defense forces and is entitled to receive liberal consideration at the hands of Congress. I oppose the amendment because I am well convinced that the amount of money now carried in the bill is ample to meet all needed expenditures for this particular purpose, and if we can save this $1,500,000 we should do so. Even $1,500,000 in these days of big items will help some.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] speaks of a National Guard of 160,000 men, and I ask you gentlemen to consider what the proposition of having 160,000 men with the usual expansion in the National Guard means. One hundred and sixty thousand men on July 1 next and 191,000 at the end of the year at $210 per man, which is the average cost in the National Guard, means $48,000,000, about. This appears in the hearings. If the line of amendments is carried out, it will mean that we are going to increase the appropriation to the National Guard by over $27,000,000. It is a necessary consequence of these various amendments in regard to the National Guard. The appropriation which the Budget Bureau recommended is $30,000,000, and that takes care of 140,000 men. This appropriation of $6,500,000 will take care of that number in the National Guard if we discount the number by such of the guard as will not attend. It we increase this to $8,000,000, it means we are contemplating having about 140,000 in these camps, or that you are going to have 160,000 men in the National Guard at a cost of nearly $50,000,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Word has just been brought to me from the War Department that last year 90,000 men availed themselves of training. According to the figures given here by the chairman of the subcommittee that cost $5,800,000, or $65 per man.

Mr. HARRISON. Fifty-six dollars and twenty-five cents per man.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This figures out $65. It is said that there will be 140,000 who will avail themselves of training this year, and $65 a man would be $9,100,000.

Mr. HARRISON. The actual figures given by the department are $56.25 a man, and my understanding is that $6,500,000 will take care of about 143,000 men in the National Guard after proper allowance for stay at homes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You could not take care of 140,000 men at $56 per man with $6,500,000.

Mr. HARRISON. But the entire appropriation takes care of 140,000 men. The Budget Bureau has recommended $30,000,000, and that takes care of the entire National Guard of 140,000.

If you are going to take care of 160,000 in the National Guard you have got to increase the appropriation to $48,000,000, $18,000,000 more than the Budget Committee requested.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Speaking of this one particular item——

Mr. HARRISON. We are talking about what it is going to cost for the instruction of the National Guard——

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will yield, in regard to the cost of this summer training the gentleman mentioned the figure of $56.25. That is based on training the guard at the old cantonments and includes quite a lot of railroad travel. If the guard training was confined and concentrated to the military posts within individual States the cost can be cut very considerably and a great number of men trained. Is not that true?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 53, noes 53.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. CRAGO and Mr. ANTHONY) reported that there were—ayes 65, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses, selected officers and enlisted men, military service schools, $250,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this not for the purpose of offering any amendment to increase the appropriation but to ask the chairman of the subcommittee a question. The committee has appropriated $250,000 for officers and enlisted men, military service schools. Does the gentleman think that that will be a sufficient sum to send to these service schools the number of men and officers of the National Guard who desire to attend them?

Mr. ANTHONY. The department asked for $348,000 for that purpose.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. We gave $225,000 during last year and we give $250,000 this year. Of course, it will not send all the National Guard officers to service schools. It is only a selected number, and the amount of the appropriation will depend upon how large a number the department selected.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that that is something which should not be neglected, because a great many of the National Guard officers who are enthusiastic and who really want this instruction at much loss to themselves are willing to take these prescribed courses at these different schools, and it makes them very efficient officers, and it makes them eligible to appointment to general staff duty, and that is about the only way a man in the National Guard can qualify for any duty other than duty in the National Guard. It is a subject which has been given a great deal of study and consideration, and the appropriation has been used in the past for sending men to those schools who have found themselves able to leave their other vocations for this time.

Mr. MANN. What are these, military schools?

Mr. CRAGO. Like any service schools we have. A course of study as it is now at Camp Benning in the Infantry and Camp Bragg probably in the Artillery, or Fort Riley or some of the other schools for the Cavalry. They send so many National Guard officers and they are making classes of these men, and they get the same intensive course of training now which is given to the officers of the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will yield, the department is sending next year 221 officers and 329 enlisted men, so the gentleman will see it is a very small program.

Mr. CRAGO. In the opinion of the chairman, will this $250,000 be sufficient——

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I do not think it will do that.

Mr. CRAGO. The program, then, will be curtailed?

Mr. ANTHONY. They will send a few more than were sent this year, but it will not permit the sending of as many as the department asked for.

Mr. CRAGO. But as many as were sent last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to offer an amendment, because I think probably in conference the conferees can work out something.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general expenses, equipment and instruction, National Guard, $850,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman some questions with reference to this item. As I understand it, the Secretary of War has recommended an appropriation of $1,605,620?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. And the gentleman has appropriated practically half that amount?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have appropriated $100,000 more for the next year than we appropriated for the current year for this purpose.

Mr. CRAGO. How did the committee divide that item from the other items on the National Guard budget?

Mr. ANTHONY. How do we make——

Mr. CRAGO. General expenses, equipment, and instruction.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is made up of a variety of items. For instance, they would pay for blank forms and publications, $50,000; traveling expenses in connection with business, $6,000; rental target ranges, $70,000; purchase target ranges, $35,000; construction, improvements, target ranges, $325,000; transfer of supplies within States, $107,500; travel expenses, surveying officers, $6,000; rental, construction, and repairs, shooting galleries, $15,120; markers and scorers, $160,000; caretakers on rifle ranges, $70,000; prizes and entrance fees, $6,000; incidental expenses, $20,000; printing, general orders, circulars, forms, and so forth, $40,000; oil, gas, and repairs to motor equipment and tanks, $525,000; amount reserved for new units, $70,000, and so forth.

Mr. CRAGO. Then the amount appropriated here will not be sufficient?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. As I said to the gentleman, the War Department has been turning over to the National Guard worlds of equipment. With every unit of Field Artillery there are 19 carloads of material, with every tank company they give them 14 tanks, and with every motor company that is organized they give them worlds of motor trucks. They are evidently trying to get rid of this material, and have the National Guard take care of it and they want us to appropriate for it. We do not think it is proper for the National Guard to take care of so much of this material.

Mr. CRAGO. I hope it will be possible for the gentleman to work out something for this.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel of officers and noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army in connection with the National Guard, $200,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The department here has recommended an appropriation that seems to be concurred in by the Chief of the Militia Bureau and the Budget Committee of $500,000. I notice the appropriation is only $200,000. This is an item which provides for the pay, expenses, allowances, and so forth, of the commissioned and noncommissioned officers of the Army who are detailed to the National Guard. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is possible for them to keep up the present courses of instruction which they have begun under this appropriation?

Mr. ANTHONY. During the current year there is appropriated for that purpose $85,000, which was later on augmented by $100,000. We are appropriating $200,000, an increase of $15,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Is that an increase over the two appropriations?

Mr. ANTHONY. Both of them. Of course, the number of officers in the Regular Army utilized by the National Guard is a flexible number, and they will use more of them or fewer of them, dependent upon the state of the appropriation.

Mr. HULL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: That last summer in my State—and I think in a great many other States—they could not send the Regular Army officers to the camps because they did not have enough money in this item to pay their railroad expenses. We had a great complaint from our State in regard to the matter. All they wanted was money enough to pay the transportation. It was a small item, but nobody could provide the money to pay the Regular Army officers to these camps of instruction, where they were so badly needed.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of equipment and supplies, $375,000.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman if that is in line with his desire to curtail the shipment of these different supplies to the National Guard units?

Mr. ANTHONY. The department asked for $500,000, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAGO. It makes a difference of $125,000

Mr. ANTHONY. And we are appropriating $375,000, which the gentleman will notice is an increase of $200,000. There will be a number of new units to supply undoubtedly during the year, and that is the reason for the increase. The expenses under this item were very heavy last year, because of the fact that so many supplies and so much equipment were furnished the guard.

Mr. CRAGO. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of National Guard (armory drills), $9,000,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: Page 80, line 20, after the parenthesis, strike out "$9,000,000" and insert "$11,000,000."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my opinion this is the most vital proposition in regard to the National Guard. It is the actual pay that you provide for the armory drills. Now, we have here an example, to my notion, of the guesswork of the Budget. The Militia Bureau originally asked for $15,000,000 for this item, and the Budget cut it down to $8,500,000, and the committee gave them $9,000,000. Last year you appropriated $9,750,000, and your guard this year is 50 per cent higher and you are appropriating less money than you did last year. Now, you can not have a guard without you pay the men who attend the drills. They may be a tank corps, they may be Cavalry, or they may be Artillery; still you have got to pay them, or else they will not attend the drills and they will go out of the guard. It is a moral obligation on this Government to pay these men, and one of the greatest things that is tending to build up the guard as it is to-day is the fact that the men are being promptly paid every time they have to attend a drill.

Now, they are not paid unless they attend. I claim that unless you increase this appropriation at least as much as they asked for you will kill the National Guard. I do not think myself that the amount that I have put in the bill will be sufficient, but it will be within a million or two million dollars of enough money to pay the guard. Remember that your guard to-day is 140,000. A year ago, the 1st of July, it was 97,000. It is estimated—and I think the estimates are very close, because they figure on a normal increase of 3,000 every month—that on the 1st of July we will have 160,000 and an average strength during the year of 175,000. My amendment provides for pay of only 130,000. It is true that probably 10 per cent, or a little less than 10 per cent, of the men that are in the National Guard are failing to attend the drill, but it is never more than 10 per cent. I have figured very closely on this item, and I am sure the amount I ask for is less than you will have to put in the bill before you get through with it. I submit this proposition, knowing these facts, that you ought to put in as much as you know you ought to have here in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise for the purpose of supporting the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

There was a time when it was believed in this country that a well-regulated militia was necessary to the security of a free State. Of course that was a long time ago. That theory was announced away back in 1789. It was embodied in our Constitution by the second amendment. If it is to have any force to-day, naturally we must presume that if we are going to have a well-regulated militia, we have got to have some militia to regulate.

Now, this amount of $11,000,000, I believe, is figured by the War Department as the minimum estimate of the pay of the National Guard. It is perfectly evident that the American people will not stand for a large professional establishment. It is very evident to me at least that a majority of this House want a very, very small professional establishment. But in a time of war we have got to depend on the citizen soldiery, and it is the part of only elementary prudence to provide for the training of citizen soldiers, soldiers of the nonprofessional class.

I want to read a little item from the Stars and Stripes, the American Legion publication, of this date, which came to my office to-day:

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE.

With $9,000,000 whacked off from the National Guard appropriations of the annual Army budget by the House of Representatives and various and sundry other wallops at the Army and the Reserve Corps, it behooves everyone who does not want to see economy extended to utter unpreparedness to get a word to their Senators on the subject.

Some of the best friends of the present three-part defense system, with a small Regular Army, a substantial National Guard, and a large citizen reserve corps, are worried because the doctrinaires of pacifism and economy seem to be united and to be making use of differences of opinion between the various parts of the national defense system.

Since the World War we have had a sort of open season at knocking the Army, and many of us have felt that we could take out any of our left-over grouches on the Regular Establishment, meanwhile merrily boosting for the National Guard and for the reserves. Now we come to a pinch, where the Congress is going to determine whether we shall have any substantial national defense or none worthy the name, and we discover that we are all standing or falling together—the Regulars, the guard, and the reserve.

The matter gives us pause. We like to carry on our own joyful little battles, such as the Colonel Peck episode, but we do not like to see the whole scheme of national defense get the worst of it merely because of our sportive instinct in heaving rocks at the Regular Army. In our hearts we know that we need an effective Regular Establishment, and since in this matter of appropriations we are living in a glass house we begin to hope that our rock throwing won't be taken seriously.

The moral of this is that we had better write to our Senators and tell them that we want adequate appropriations for an effective system of national defense. We will lose all the fun of our personal squabbles between the guard and the Regulars and the reserves if all three of them are whittled down to little or nothing worth while talking about.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not ask now to take up the time of the committee, because the several items referred to have already been considerably discussed, but I would like the privilege of extending my remarks for the purpose of putting in a one-page letter from the adjutant general of the State of Colorado on the items we are now considering in this bill. The adjutant general calls attention to the fact that 60 per cent of our officers in the World War got their initial training in the National Guard. That is, however, only a small part of the benefit derived by the country from the military education of a large body of patriotic men who have always served as our first line of defense in time of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

STATE OF COLORADO,
OFFICE OF THE ADJUTANT GENERAL,
STATE CAPITOL BUILDING,
Denver, March 20, 1922.

From: The Adjutant General.
To: Congressman WILLIAM N. VAILE, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Appropriation, H. R. 10871.

1. I desire to bring to your attention the matter of H. R. 10871, and to ask your favorable consideration to the end that a more liberal appropriation can be effected toward the National Guard, a force which has proved its worth to the United States Government, and the force which offers the best known means for the training of young men of the country to be better enabled to protect the country in times of need.

2. The following information is furnished in connection with the above-mentioned bill:

No item for purchase of animals.

Page 79, lines 24 and 25, provides for 4,000 animals, whereas 8,000 have already been issued to the National Guard.

Page 80, lines 3 and 4: Care of matériel, animals, and equipment, $750,000; provides for caretakers for 4,000 animals and a balance of $100,000 for other caretakers and mechanics.

Estimates submitted for 9,740 animals, caretakers, $1,910,500.

Six million five hundred thousand dollars will provide for only 115,000 men for 15 days. National Guard has now a strength of over 145,000; $9,500,000 minimum requirement.

Page 80, lines 6 and 7: Expenses officers and specially selected men, $250,000. Item may send 156 officers and 156 men only. Last year 220 applied to attend Benning alone.

N. B. No funds under section 81, national defense act.

Page 80, lines 12, 13, and 14: Travel of noncommissioned officers, $200,000. Insufficient present year and $500,000 needed for 1923.

Page 80, line 17: Transportation and equipment and supplies, $375,000. Inadequate this year and $200,000 additional needed under provisions of bill for 1923.

Page —, line 20, armory drill pay, $9,000,000; estimated $11,000,000 minimum requirement.

Page 82, lines 7, 8, 9, 10: The mounted, motorized, and tank units of the National Guard shall be so reduced that the appropriations made in this act shall cover the entire cost maintenance of such units for the National Guard during the fiscal year 1923.

3. It must be remembered that of all officers of the Army of the United States during the World War 60 per cent thereof had their initial training in the National Guard.

* * * * * * *

4. I respectfully urge that you carefully consider the above-mentioned H. R. 10871 and support a more favorable appropriation to provide for a betterment of the conditions surrounding the National Guard.

P. J. HAMROCK,
The Adjutant General, State of Colorado.

General Hamrock is an officer of long experience, both in the ranks of the Regular service and as a National Guard officer and as an officer commanding troops in the field in the World War. He commanded the One Hundred and Fifty-seventh Infantry in France. That regiment, formed upon a nucleus of Colorado National Guard battalions, was complimented by general officers who inspected it as one of the best trained and best equipped regiments in the service. Although it did not see action as a unit, its personnel, used as replacement troops for other organizations, particularly in the Argonne fighting, rendered service of which the State and the Nation may well be proud and which will be a lasting testimonial to the regiment's commanding officer, Colonel Hamrock.

It is my earnest hope that such efficient training may be liberally continued in the future. It is a credit to the men engaged in it and it is of the utmost value to the country.

Adjutant General Hamrock speaks with an authoritative knowledge of his subject. He also speaks from the standpoint of patriotism and of devotion to the public service.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am very fearful that the Members of the House do not appreciate the fact that a federalized National Guard is an entirely different body from the old National Guard that we had before the war. We are now paying the members of the National Guard for attending drills. They are no longer a body over which we have no control, and we can call them into the service at any time. To-day the National Guard is the first line of defense, on a par with our Regular Establishment. For the benefit of some of the Members of the House I wish to point out the fact that the federalized National Guard as at present organized has about 75 per cent of World War officers in the infantry units and in the artillery units about 90 per cent of the officers saw service. Although the men are new, we have a federalized National Guard that can be called into the service without delay, and it will be practically on a par with the Regular Establishment.

What you have got to decide is whether you are going to support the policy of maintaining a federalized National Guard or whether you are going back to the prewar days when we did not pay the National Guard for drills and for attending the encampments. I do not care one iota what the subchairman or his committee of five say. This amount in the bill will not provide pay for the drills of every member of the guard. I ask you to listen to the figures presented by the gentleman who proposed this amendment. All that I have got to depend upon is what the War Department says and what the Militia Bureau says. I am not familiar with the figures any more than any other Member, but I know this much, that the federalized National Guard is your first line of defense, and you have got to decide on a definite military policy. You have got either to pay them for their drills and encampments or you have got to throw the whole thing overboard and depend solely upon the Regular Establishment. That is the issue and that is what you have got to vote on. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is the duty of every Representative here to speak what he thinks is the will and desire of the citizens of his district and the citizens of his Commonwealth; and I feel that the citizenship of the State that I have the honor in part to represent is desirous of supporting the National Guard of our States. [Applause.]

Now, during the days before the World War the National Guard came in for many useful purposes. Since the war the National Guard is being reorganized as rapidly as it is possible to reorganize it, and the adjutant generals of the States and their staffs are working night and day trying to get the guard well organized again in the different States. The guardsmen are often needed at home within the different States, and, as has been mentioned here several times, should we become engaged in conflict again, the National Guard would be called upon as promptly and as urgently as it was when we became engaged in the late World War.

The National Guard is growing to-day. They number far ahead of what they were a year ago. That increase must be taken into consideration. I think, as I said before, the citizens of the States which we represent wish to support a strong National Guard. This is a citizen army which we are trying to build up, and which our citizenship wants, which will feed itself 50 weeks in the year, and I think that we should, in carrying out the will and desire of our people, provide to feed and pay these men two weeks in the year during the summer encampment, which, by the way, is no frolic for them. They get right down to real business and to hard work, and they study tactics and work out problems and maneuvers. It is a training which they need and which will give them a little jump on the other fellow in case of need. Of course, they are paid a small amount for attending drills throughout the winter and throughout the year. That is as it should be.

In the old days the guard had a hard struggle for its very existence, because of the fact that there was very little popular support. But the people desire the guard to be supported now and to be provided for when they go to the summer encampments. As I said, they feed themselves 50 weeks in the year.

If you will build up a strong, efficient National Guard, you will have a nucleus in case you get into any sort of trouble; a nucleus that is ready to step right into the breach, and ready to act as instructors to those who have never had any military experience at all.

I know that at the beginning of the late war many a young fellow who had had, comparatively speaking, only slight experience in the National Guard went straight into the Army, and with that little experience as a start he developed so quickly that he was soon able to take his place at the head of untrained troops. A strong, well-trained National Guard will prove to be the best possible insurance policy for the peace and security of our Nation. [Applause.]

When we cut down the Regular Army establishment it is most certainly the better part of wisdom to develop and build up the National Guard of the States. Remember, it is not only for war purposes that we need the guard, but for many useful purposes at home in the cities and throughout the country during peace time. Some people cuss the National Guard around pretty severely some of the time, but in my experience in the National Guard, if you will pardon a personal reference, and in my observation of experiences in other places I have noticed that while the National Guard are cussed out and cuffed around a good deal the fact remains that whenever anything happens—if there is a riot, a flood, a fire, or any emergency—people yell for the National Guard to turn out immediately, and they want them there in "double time." [Applause.]

Now, concerning our policy for the National Guard, which is our hope for the future, so far as an Army is concerned, let us not be "penny-wise and pound-foolish." Therefore, my friends, I earnestly bespeak your support for the amendment pending. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs associated with our good friend Mr. ANTHONY, of Kansas, Mr. CRAGO, of Pennsylvania, and other gentlemen who are Members of the House, I took a very great interest, as all of these gentlemen did, in writing the law for the federalizing of the National Guard, rather than the adoption of what was to be known as the continental army scheme. I was profoundly interested in the National Guard at that time and have been ever since. In a little speech that I made on the national defense act I said at that time that the National Guard was now on trial and that it would remain to be seen whether it could make good or not; that if it failed we would have to adopt some other military policy. But I am sure we all agree after the experience of the Great War that the National Guard did make good. As a citizen of Illinois, I am proud, indeed, of the record of the Thirty-third Division, which included the National Guard of the State of Illinois. [Applause.] That is no reflection on the National Guard of the other States of this Union, which did equally well. Now, to-day I am only interested in seeing to it that the National Guard has sufficient funds to enable it to function properly. I want to ask my good friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the chairman of the subcommittee, a question or two in regard to this matter. I would like to ask the gentleman how he arrived at the figures $9,000,000 for drill pay?

Mr. ANTHONY. The same question is involved in the matter of drill pay that is involved in the matter of the summer training. It is entirely guesswork as to the number of men in the guard who will qualify for the maximum pay allowed by law. If a man attends every drill—that is, four drills a month for the entire year—an enlisted man can obtain $60 per annum; but the figures show about the same percentage of attendance at drills as of attendance at the summer encampments, and that percentage, as I am informed by the clerk of the committee who has just called up the Militia Bureau, is 66 per cent. So in making up our bill we take 160,000 men and estimate the maximum enlisted pay they can get at $60 a man, and that makes $9,600,000. Two-thirds of that amounts to $6,400,000 for the percentage that actually attend the drills, as proven by past experience. Now, we have got to allow for the officers. We have about 7,000 officers in the National Guard, so that the committee felt that, based on the percentages of attendance, $9,000,000 would take care of this item. I want the gentleman to observe that that is half a million dollars more than the budget estimate. We have endeavored not to exceed the budget estimates, and we have increased them in only one or two instances, but this is one of the instances where we increased the budget estimate half a million dollars.

Mr. McKENZIE. These boys get a dollar a night for drill pay, and I have always understood that the gentleman from Kansas was a friend of the National Guard.

Mr. ANTHONY. As the gentleman knows, I had something to do with the preparation of the defense act of 1916.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would be the last man to criticize the efforts of this committee in their work, but I want to be sure and I want the committee to be sure that in placing the figures in the bill as they have them written, especially on this item, they are satisfied that the National Guard will not suffer for lack of appropriations from this Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman agree that it is a matter of guesswork as to the exact amount of money that will be requested by the guard?

Mr. McKENZIE. Of course.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is simply a matter of the number of drills that the men attend?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. And it is all a matter of guess and estimate. We figured that when we increased the budget estimate half a million dollars we had a good margin of safety.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. How much did you appropriate last year?

Mr. ANTHONY. Last year we appropriated $9,750,000.

Mr. HULL. Your guard has increased 50 per cent, and yet you have cut your appropriation down. How do you make your figures correspond?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, we presumed that the Budget Committee probably made an investigation and has some idea.

Mr. HULL. As a matter of fact the Militia Bureau wanted $15,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes.

Mr. HULL. And the Budget Committee insisted on cutting it down 50 per cent without knowing anything about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The figures of the Militia Bureau were so wild on their face that we did not believe we should follow them.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is there going to be any surplus left of the $9,750,000 appropriated for this fiscal year?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not give that information. We can not tell what percentage of the men will attend these drills the balance of this year.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What is the indication at this time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not say as to that. The Militia Bureau says the percentage of attendance is 66⅔.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It would seem that after eight months of the year had passed by the Militia Bureau ought to be able to give some pretty accurate estimate of that.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be rather difficult.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. They report every two weeks, do they not?

Mr. ANTHONY. The men may not attend all of the drills during the next few months. They can not tell what the attendance will be.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Can not the Militia Bureau tell how the fund is holding out?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to fix an accurate figure for this appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to call attention to the figures given in the hearings? Major Wilson says:

Allowing for possibility of facts yet to occur being different from the forecast, it is believed that $11,000,000 should be appropriated for the armory drill pay for the National Guard for the fiscal year 1923 on the basis of the ultimate strength of 191,000 for that year.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the view of the Militia Bureau?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. That is on page 1339 of the hearings.

Mr. ANTHONY. They will not average 191,000 during the next fiscal year, and it is perfectly evident that we do not have to appropriate that amount.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, this item of $9,000,000 for drill pay constitutes a direct limitation upon the size of the National Guard of this country, because it is evident that no more men will go into the National Guard than are appropriated for under the bill. When I was a member of the National Guard drill was a matter of pride and patriotism, and it may be that it is a question that can be argued as to the advisability of paying the men, but one thing is certain, that since you have established the principle of paying for drills you must provide pay enough for all. You can not expect some to drill for only the glory of it while others are being paid $1 per night for drilling.

The added responsibility and liabilities placed on the National Guard by the federalized law probably justifies the giving of them this very small pay, which is but a fraction of the cost of a standing army of similar size, whom you have to feed in addition to paying it. I think we ought to be glad to pay this small pittance to every citizen of this country who is willing to take a drill a week to make himself proficient, as far as he can become proficient, by being a part of the National Guard. I think this amendment is in accordance with the traditional policy of our country. We have always been against a large standing Army in time of peace. I myself voted last session to cut the Army down to 150,000, and I am satisfied with the cut that is now made to 115,000, provided you furnish a second line of defense to take the place of the reduction you have made in the standing Army by building up and supporting a strong National Guard. It has been said that the Militia Bureau asked for $15,000,000 and the committee gave them $9,000,000. This amendment increases the item in the bill to $11,000,000. If the National Guard men do not use it, it will not be wasted; it will revert to the United States Treasury. It is an incentive to the officers to get the men into the guard and to attend drill if they know that the money is there for them. If the money is not there, they will lack the incentive to ask the men to come out and take the drill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were 36 ayes and 42 noes.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. HULL.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 60 ayes and 54 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to speak for just a few moments out of order. It is a matter of personal convenience to me, otherwise I would not ask to keep you here, because I understand that you will adjourn in a few minutes.

I am going to refer to certain conditions in my home town. I am going to use it to illustrate a national problem. This matter properly comes under the items of rivers and harbors.

A few years ago the Government agreed to perform certain work in the harbor at Dunkirk, N. Y., provided the city as a condition precedent would erect a municipal dock. The city fulfilled its obligations, and in order to do so bonded itself heavily and built a fine modern dock, which was approved by the Secretary of War. The city was then ready to develop its commerce, had plans under consideration for the erection of warehouses, modern unloading apparatus to develop its commerce, but the Government failed to repair the breakwater which has caused the harbor to shoal. This detached breakwater, 2,860 feet long, is almost utterly destroyed, and as a result every storm throws tons of stone and sand into the harbor, causing it to shoal. There has not been a time prior to 1917 that the vessels in the harbor and the property along the shore have not been in danger from the severe storms that almost annually visit the locality.

In December, 1921, a severe storm swept across Lake Erie and two ships in the Dunkirk Harbor were sunk. The new municipal dock is now in danger of being destroyed by these heavy storms, a thoroughfare of the city is being gradually washed, and recently some of the street lighting along this street was destroyed.

It appears in the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, 1920, page 1683, that the citizens of Dunkirk bonded the city for a large amount and built a fine municipal dock, which had the approval of the Secretary of War. There has not been a time since this expenditure on the part of the city that the Government has sufficiently maintained the harbor to enable the shipping that desires to enter the harbor to do so.

On page 231 of the hearings on this bill General Taylor, without intending to do so, left the impression with the committee that the Dunkirk Harbor could not be used because its depth is only 16 feet. He states that because of this the harbor is not sufficient for the large lake boats to enter the harbor even if the breakwater were repaired. It is quite true that the largest lake boats could not use this harbor, and the city of Dunkirk is not seeking to have the harbor made available for the largest boats. As a matter of fact, when we consider that on June 30, 1918, the Great Lakes documented American merchant fleet totaled 2,939 vessels of 2,797,503 tons, of which 133 were sailing vessels, 2,295 were steam vessels, only a few of which draw 21 feet, it is apparent that the traffic is not confined to deep-draft boats.

On June 30, 1919, the documented American merchant fleet on the Great Lakes aggregated 3,043 vessels of 3,023,762 tons. It is obvious that the number of smaller boats on the Lakes is rapidly increasing; that the very large boats are built exclusively for the iron ore, coal, and grain trade, although much of this freight is handled by the smaller boats drawing less than 16 feet of water.

With reference to the number and character of the boats that could enter Dunkirk Harbor if the breakwater were to be put in repair and the shoals referred to in the Engineer's Report removed, I wish to insert in the RECORD the names and dimensions of boats that could enter Dunkirk Harbor either for the purpose of commerce or as a harbor of refuge.

Passenger steamers that could enter Dunkirk Harbor if breakwater were repaired and shoals removed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. It may be of interest to Members of the House to know something of the volume of freight traffic on the Great Lakes. The statistics show that the passage of vessels through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals in the navigable season of 1895 amounted to a total of 15,062,580 short tons of freight, of which 70 per cent was carried by steamers. Of this total only 3.75 per cent was carried by Canadian vessels. In the season of 1918 the freight carried through the Sault Ste. Marie Canals was 85,680,327 short tons, of which 96 per cent was carried in steamers, and only 6 per cent of the whole was carried in Canadian vessels.

The Dunkirk Harbor is located about halfway between Erie and Buffalo, and is the only harbor of refuge for freight and passenger boats for a distance of 100 miles. In this connection it is interesting to note that the volume of shipments of grain and flour—mainly grain—which passes directly by the Dunkirk Harbor to the city of Buffalo, a distance of 41 miles, as shown by the receipts amounted in 1913 to 214,806,812 bushels. The shipments of grain that went into Buffalo during the year 1914 amounted to 185,061,619 bushels; and in the year 1915 the shipments amounted to 250,152,948 bushels; in 1916 the shipments amounted to 208,727,132 bushels; in the next year 163,031,322 bushels; and in 1918 they were 153,409,567 bushels.

The 1918 Canada Yearbook, published by the Dominion Government, states that the shipments of grain on Canadian vessels from Fort William and Port Arthur during the navigable seasons of 1917 and 1918 were: In 1917 a total of 198,455,258 bushels, of which 101,012,536 bushels went to Canadian ports and 97,422,722 bushels to American ports. In 1918 the total was 51,215,097 bushels, of which 50,830,272 bushels went to Canadian ports and 384,825 bushels to American ports. The Canada Yearbook fails to give any reason for the decrease from 1917 to 1918.

I mention this vast tonnage that passes the Dunkirk Harbor coming from the West to the East, because it shows the possibilities of developing commerce at the Dunkirk Harbor if the Government would maintain the breakwater, remove the shoals, and meet its responsibility so far as maintenance is concerned.

Aside from this, it has prevented certain industrial development and thus greatly injured the city and prevented the promotion of a large commerce at our port. You may be interested to know that two years ago an industry employing 600 men at high wages desired to locate on our lake front without one cent of cost to the city, provided we could give some assurance that the harbor would be maintained for lake traffic. This is a matter of personal knowledge, because I conducted the negotiations. Because of my failure to secure any assurance of cooperation from the Government, I was obliged to state to the officers connected with this industry that we could not meet this requirement. The development of the Dunkirk Harbor has always had the opposition of the railroad companies. It was only after a most bitter controversy that the people of the city were able to secure the water front from the grasp of the railroad company for the location of the present municipal dock. It has also been the policy of the railroads at Dunkirk, as elsewhere, to throttle every attempt to provide water transportation, and in view of the present high cost of transportation rates, our business men feel that we should not be prevented through lack of Government cooperation in utilizing our municipal dock and other facilities at this time.

The facts are quite clearly set forth in a recent letter from the Board of Commerce at Dunkirk, N. Y., a portion of which I shall ask permission to insert in the RECORD:

Due to the condition into which the Government has permitted our harbor to get, we have at present but little lake business outside of the floats, or fishing steamers, which make this harbor their home; but this business is one of no small importance. The C. J. Alexander concern handled last year the production of 23 steamers and gasoline boats, employing 100 men, and produced 1,237,645 pounds of fish valued at $82,229. The Desmond Fish Co. operates about 16 boats, most of them steamers, employs about 115 men, and from December 1, 1918, to November 30, 1919, produced 1,702,273 pounds of fish, valued at $106,862.25. Apart from what the employment of these 200 men mean to Dunkirk, of still more importance is the fact that in these days when the fishing problem and high cost of living is so vital, it should be seen to that this approximately 3,000,000 pounds of fish per annum should not be lost to the people of the United States, but the fishing companies inform us that their floats are battered and in constant danger in our harbor due to the dilapidation of the break wall, and that unless repairs are made this industry will have to be abandoned.

As to the commerce in our harbor: It is passing by us through no fault of ours nor through any indifference on the part of the navigation companies, but only because the Government has failed to back our efforts with reasonable help. The letters from the navigation companies will show you the interest felt by them in urging the present needed repairs.

In reply to the statement that there is no commerce at the city of Dunkirk, I wish to show how the water transportation companies feel with reference to this harbor. I respectfully submit letters from various transportation companies on this point.

The Cleveland & Buffalo Transit Co. writes as follows:

As you know, this company operates daily between Cleveland and Buffalo, passing in the vicinity of your harbor. In former years we had a remunerative business in and out of your harbor and might be glad to make it a port of call in the future, if the harbor is kept up and made safe. Also the Lake Excursion Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., has done considerable business between Buffalo and your city and would continue with good safe harbor facilities.

I therefore trust and hope you will be able to convince the committee at Washington to proceed with these repairs and improvements. I might also add that under certain weather conditions Dunkirk Harbor might prove valuable as a harbor of refuge.

The Great Lakes Transit Corporation makes this appeal:

Dunkirk is the only port between Erie and Buffalo on the American side. We feel deeply interested in the usability and availability of all the Lake ports along the chain of lakes, and are interested in having such ports available for business or safety, as the case may be.

We are informed that the breakwater at Dunkirk is in such bad condition that unless repaired now it is doubtful whether anything other than building anew will avail.

Trusting that you will give this your early and earnest attention, we remain.

Brown & Co., Lake Transportation, Buffalo, N. Y., write as follows:

As you are aware, Dunkirk is the only port between Buffalo and Erie on the American side. We, of course, being interested in the transportation business, are interested in the availability of all Lake ports along the chain of lakes and in having such ports available for business or safety.

We are also informed that the breakwater at the port of Dunkirk is in such deplorable condition that unless repairs are made it is doubtful whether there will be any new projects started, as there is not a satisfactory breakwater there.

We sincerely hope that you will give this matter your earnest and prompt consideration.

The Interlake Steamship Co., Buffalo, N. Y., express their views as follows:

It is of vital interest to us as well as the shipping interests of the Lakes that these repairs should be made at once, as well as making every effort to place a suitable depth of water at that point to meet the requirements of the fleet that is navigating the Great Lakes and destined to Buffalo. As a harbor of refuge as well as a port of entry, it deserves the attention of your committee.

WATER.

One of the leading industries in my home town is the Atlas Crucible Steel Co., the product of which goes to all parts of this country and abroad. This company is very desirous of water transportation for its products, and I quote from their letter with reference to the importance of immediate action in connection with the Dunkirk Harbor:

Dunkirk certainly needs a harbor, and it needs a good one. The present condition of the break wall is not such as to encourage lake commerce from this port. So far as our own company is concerned we want to say that we have large steel warehouses in Cleveland, Detroit, and Chicago, and in each of these cities we have customers whose tonnage purchases from us are very heavy. The present transportation facilities offered by the railroads are becoming most prolific sources of delay, inconvenience, and annoyance, and our company is virtually praying for the time to come when Dunkirk will be provided with adequate harbor facilities, so that our heavy tonnages of steel might be transported by water. If we had these added facilities it might encourage extensions to our own plant and business, which otherwise we can hardly consider.

We can not think of anything at this time that is more imperative and essential to the future growth and prosperity of Dunkirk than the improvement of our harbor and the introduction of adequate lake service, which would inevitably follow. It would benefit not only Dunkirk, but it would be of paramount advantage to those large consumers of steel in Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, and western points which draw upon us for their requirements of this important commodity.

We are certainly watching with interest the efforts you are putting forth in this connection, and hope that the legitimacy of your contentions for an improved harbor at Dunkirk will be recognized by the good people at Washington.

I would like to quote from a letter written by the manager of the United States Radiator Corporation, located at Detroit, Mich., with plants at Dunkirk, N. Y.; West Newton, Pa.; Geneva, N. Y.; Edwardsville, Ill.; Paola, Kans.; Detroit, Mich.; and Corry, Pa. He states as follows:

We use at our Dunkirk plant materials which might very profitably be carried by water. We secure pig iron from both Buffalo and Cleveland markets, and we secure sand in large quantities from Lake Michigan ports. We also ship finished materials to Detroit, Minneapolis, and Chicago. On all of this material we need very much to enjoy the benefit of lake rates. We therefore sincerely hope that the improvement will go through.

Supplementing this letter is one from the manager of the United States Radiator Corporation, located at Dunkirk, in which this statement is made:

We have at Dunkirk one of our largest plants for the manufacture of radiators for house heating. In the pursuit of our business we find it necessary to procure pig iron from both Buffalo and Cleveland markets, and we procure sand in large quantities from Lake Michigan points.

We also ship finished materials in carload quantities to Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, and Chicago. On all this incoming and outgoing material we need very much to enjoy the benefit of lake rates or lake and rail rates. We are advised that the appropriation under consideration will complete the making of a real harbor at Dunkirk, which no doubt will become a port of entry to transportation lines seeking business.

We therefore sincerely hope that the improvement will go through.

Boland & Cornelius, lake transportation, write from Buffalo, N. Y., with reference to the importance of Dunkirk as a harbor of refuge:

For some time past we have realized the importance that should be given to Dunkirk Harbor as a harbor of refuge. The breakwater there now is in such a bad condition that if it is permitted to remain in its present state the value of it will be entirely destroyed and the Government, at some future time, will be obliged to spend a far greater sum of money than would be necessary at the present time.

With the increasing commerce of the Lakes, there is no question but that, in a short time, if the Government sees fit to improve this harbor at Dunkirk, a large amount of shipping would be done at that port. It has great advantages for a large shipbuilding or steel plant, and this can not be nor will it be entertained unless the Government does its share in the improvement of this harbor.

We respectfully urge that you use your influence for this important project.

A letter received from the Commercial Machine Co., of Dunkirk, N. Y., written prior to the damage done by this recent storm, sets forth the facts with reference to the breakwater, which I will read:

Referring to the condition of the break wall in the Dunkirk Harbor. One of the bad places is just opposite our shop on West Front Street. This wall gets the incoming seas in the winter very hard. The poles supported by trolley wires are just at the edge of the bank now. Two years ago they were fully 8 feet within the edge of the bank. If the storms this winter are as severe as those of last winter I expect to see from 4 to 8 feet of West Front Street scattered over the harbor. It looks to us as if the break wall should be repaired at the earliest possible moment, as continual wearing away of the bank will not only fill up the harbor but carry away the poles on West Front Street.

A storm previous to this last great storm in December tore away the poles referred to in this letter and destroyed 100 street lights along the street, which is one of the main traveled thoroughfares in our city and the only direct route along the lake front for through highway traffic from Chicago to Buffalo.

It seems to me that the Government is under a moral obligation to maintain the harbor in view of the large expenditure made by the city in the erection of the municipal dock. The city should be permitted to carry out its plans to develop commerce at this port and not be told repeatedly each year that it has no commerce, when it is obvious that there can be no large volume of shipments because the Government has permitted certain portions of the harbor to shoal. This failure also to maintain the breakwater leaves all ships that enter the harbor exposed to every severe storm that visits that locality.

There is another obligation resting on the Government, and that is to maintain the breakwater and an open channel so that boats in distress may use it as a harbor of refuge. It may be of interest to the Members to know that in 1917 there were 20 ships lost on the Great Lakes, representing a total of 24,086 gross tons; in 1918, 21 ships, of 21,035 gross tons. The loss during the season of 1919 amounted to 18 ships, which represents a gross tonnage of 26,485. When the Government placed a lighthouse at Dunkirk, it realized that this harbor afforded the last chance for rescue of ships in distress anywhere between the city of Erie and the city of Buffalo. This last fall during a heavy storm one of the tugs left the harbor under most adverse conditions because of the condition of the breakwater, went out to a foundering ship, and saved every person on board except one. It is unfair under the plea of economy to expose the lives of passengers and crews to the fury of the storms when a small expenditure would make the Dunkirk Harbor a safe refuge in case of threatened disaster. The importance of Dunkirk as a harbor of refuge is supported by many letters from lake transportation companies, and without taking more of your time I will quote from a letter from

Boland & Cornelius, engaged in lake transportation, who stress this point in their letter, a portion of which I wish to quote:

For some time past we have realized the importance that should be given to Dunkirk Harbor as a harbor of refuge. The breakwater there now is in such a bad condition that if it is permitted to remain in its present state the value of it will be entirely destroyed and the Government at some future time will be obliged to spend a far greater sum of money than would be necessary at the present time.

With the increasing commerce of the lakes, there is no question but that in a short time, if the Government sees fit to improve this harbor of Dunkirk, a large amount of shipping would be done at that port. It has great advantages for a large shipbuilding or steel plant, and this can not be nor will it be entertained unless the Government does its share in the improvement of this harbor.

We respectfully urge that you use your influence for this important project.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenditures for carrying out the provisions of this act shall not be made in such manner as to prevent the operation of the Government arsenals at their most economical rate of production, except when a special exigency requires the operation of a portion of an arsenal's equipment at a different rate.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: Page 102, line 24, after the word "rate," insert a new paragraph:

"That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary, or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other time-measuring device, a time study of any job or of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work, nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. NOLAN. Had we not better have the point of order settled at this time?

Mr. HULL. Yes. What is the point of order?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane and that it is new legislation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it has been on the appropriation bill for nearly 10 years. It has been carried on the military bill and on the naval bill and on the fortifications bill for nearly 10 years. The point of order has been decided some 30 times.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is clearly in order. It has been on every Army and Navy bill since 1914 and also on the fortifications bill when that bill was reported as an independent appropriation bill. This is the so-called stop-watch provision. It has been held in order repeatedly, and I am surprised that the chairman of this subcommittee makes the point of order. He knows as well as any Member of the House that the matter has been held in order time after time by the chairmen of the various committees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Whatever the opinion of the Chair might have been if this were being brought up for the first time, he feels bound by the precedents and practices in ruling upon this and similar amendments. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 105 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The lady from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to return to page 105 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment proposed by Miss ROBERTSON: Page 105, between lines 19 and 20, insert the following new paragraph:

"For reconditioning the road from Fort Gibson, Okla., to the Fort Gibson National Cemetery, Okla., $20,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, after strife comes peace. After the soldier's life, for many a grave in some quiet national cemetery. Such a quiet resting place for more than 3,000, nearly 400 of whom are "unknown dead," is the old cemetery at Fort Gibson, a pioneer fort of more than a hundred years ago, then one of the border chain of military posts, and so far remote as to be a place of banishment. Jefferson Davis, an ambitious young lieutenant, was punished by exile there for his daring in aspiring to the hand of the fair Betty Taylor, and through weary months of lonely brooding over what he felt was wrong and injustice, he perhaps was planning his future career as he rode the Fort Gibson trails in his cavalry drills or Indian scouting.

Not in the officers' plat but one in the long line of modest stones bearing names of Indians who followed the Stars and Stripes in the sixties is one placed for Billy Bowlegs, one of the intrepid band of Seminoles driven from the Florida Everglades, who turned against the South that banished him, strangely fighting and dying under the flag he had fought, as later men of the South fought and died under the Stars and Stripes in the Spanish-American War.

Within the past year and a half 20 men of the World War have found their final resting place in this historic, sacred ground. The road leading from the old abandoned post is a mere rough trail. It must be reconditioned. The Army owns it, but there is no appropriation. Therefore I ask you, against whose proposed millions of appropriations I have so consistently voted, to give this $20,000.

Talking on "the bonus bill" many of you had much to say about our men who gave all. I can not talk about them. I bade them good-by and "Godspeed" with a smile on my face, but you know the grief under the smile; you said "good-bys." too, and you followed them with hope and love and prayer. You have stood with bowed head and tear-filled eyes when "taps" were sounded over the open grave.

Over this rough trail was borne a few days ago the body of a gallant soldier who carrying dispatches in the Argonne was wounded and gassed. He made as brave a fight for life as he had made for his country, but it was a losing fight away from home in a distant hospital Our country tried to save him. You know not one of us here but would take the last dollar in the Treasury if necessary to care for our wounded and helpless World War veterans, but all that could be done was vain. He sleeps where the sod is already green over his comrades and where the mocking birds unceasingly trill from the great trees that shade them.

On Decoration Day the Boy Scouts, growing up into earnest loyal citizens, will lead the procession over this rough trail with the martial dirge of their fife and drum. Then will follow the World War men, the Spanish War veterans, the National Guard, and if the trail after the spring rains is not too rough the little handful of Boys in Gray and Boys in Blue of the War between the States. There will be patriotic music and speeches. Sombrely clad widows and gold-star mothers will bedew with tears the flowers they so tenderly strew, and white-robed maidens will place the little flags and scatter blossoms over the grassy mounds of a century's dead. Outside the walls the patriotic women workers in war days, ministers of help and comfort in peace because they have not forgotten war, will serve the veterans of all the wars with coffee and sandwiches.

I have trailed over that rough road in the final journey of my own kindred for whom this year I may not strew flowers. I know the pain of that rude jostling on the way. Will not you give us the money—the $20,000—for this road? [Applause.]

SEVERAL MEMBERS. We will.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the lady from Oklahoma will be considered as pending, and the question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The following unexpended balances or portions of unexpended balances or combined unexpended balances or combined portions of unexpended balances of appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment and for other purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund and be covered into the Treasury immediately upon the approval of this act: Arming and equipping the militia, $178,120.96; field artillery for Organized Militia, $549.84; temporary office building, War Department, $4,907.10; military posts, Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, $856.60; transportation for refugee American citizens from Mexico, $50,846.69; transportation to China of Chinese refugees, $31,165; memorial archway at Vicksburg, Miss., $500; National Memorial Celebration and Peace Jubilee, Vicksburg, Miss., $23,229.63; medals for officers, men, etc., of National Guard, War with Spain, and Mexican border service, $207.87; equipping Army transports with lifeboats and rafts, $2,218.08; exchange of Army cold-storage plant, Chicago, Ill., $500; supply depot, Fort Sam Houston, Tex., $1,017.49; Army supply depot, Fort Mason, Calif., $2.64; road to national cemetery, Salisbury, N. C., $235.09; Signal Service of the Army, $407.10; repair and restoration of defenses of Galveston, Tex., $1,797.81; sea walls and embankments, Panama Canal, $3,270.99; land defenses, Panama Canal, $1,165.30; terminal storage and shipping buildings, $21,440.43; armament of fortifications, act of February 28, 1920, $2,619; proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J., $93,538.69; ordnance depot, Panama Canal, $35,980.22; storage facilities at armories and arsenals, $1.45; automatic rifles, $2,439.20; ordnance depot, Honolulu, Hawaii, $42.68; Army powder factory, $2.40; international rifle competition, Camp Perry, Ohio, $2,202.38; inland and port storage and shipping facilities, $2,000,000; radiodynamic torpedoes, $720,000; Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., $165,777.64; Picatinny Arsenal, Dover, N. J., $92,824.11; Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill., $243,384.04; San Antonio Arsenal, San Antonio, Tex., $3,723.31; Springfield Arsenal, Springfield, Mass., $1,945.01; Watervliet Arsenal, West Troy, N. Y., $2,237.62; Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass., $5,788.58; total appropriations recovered, $3,694,944.95.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the chairman as to terminal storage and shipping building, in lines 7 and 8, $21,440.43.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Page 104.

Mr. ANTHONY. Lines 7 and 8?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can tell the gentleman by looking into the matter just what terminals and storage buildings are referred to. I think it refers to terminal and storage buildings authorized during the war, and this is the unexpended balance.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is what I would like to know, whether we are still expending money on projects like that at Charleston, S. C., and Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will state that the object of the committee in making the investigation was to see what we could find out about sums appropriated for the War Department in past years and still available for expenditure and not expended and put them back into the Treasury, so that Congress would know from now on just what it was doing. That was our idea in assembling all of these unexpended balances, which total some $3,000,000 and more, and putting them back in the Treasury.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is there anyone who can tell me now just where this comes from?

Mr. ANTHONY. What does the gentleman want to know?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up the time of the committee, but I wish the chairman of the subcommittee would extend his remarks on this question and give this information as to where this comes from.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have in the files of the committee a list of these different items with the date of appropriation and how long the appropriation would still be available, and so forth. Most of them are available until expended, but we went very carefully over the entire list with the Chief of Finance and agreed with him that this amount should be turned back into the Treasury. We thought it unwise that this amount of money should remain available for expenditure for objects of which Congress had probably lost track.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the matter is not too long I would ask the gentleman to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will come to the committee room we can give the information to him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, has the Clerk read the title of the next item?

The CHAIRMAN. The title has been read.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10871 had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXVI, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3300. An act granting a pension to Marie Doughty Gorgas; to the Committee on Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DUNBAR, for six days, on account of business.

To Mr. ALMON, for six days, on account of official business.

To Mr. REED of New York, for six days, on account of business.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have leave of absence in order that I may go with the Military Committee to Muscle Shoals, to be back Friday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for leave of absence until Friday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the appropriation bill which has been under consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. The lady from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend her remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, after the conclusion of the consideration of the bill now before the House, it is the intention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to call up for consideration Senate joint resolution 160, authorizing the extension for a period of time the payment of the principal and interest of the Austrian debt incurred in the purchase of flour. It will probably take but a short time to dispose of it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield in connection with that?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A point of order was reserved on the resolution. I think it is a matter of some importance to be considered before it is called up, as to whether or not the resolution is privileged. I venture, if the gentleman will permit, to state now the idea that is in my mind.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply refer to that resolution for the purpose of submitting a unanimous-consent request, namely, that following the consideration of the resolution, if the Committee on Ways and Means should call it up, we may take up for consideration under the rules of the House applicable thereto the bill H. R. 10864, to authorize an appropriation to enable the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau to provide for the construction of additional hospital facilities, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, would that interfere with the possible consideration of the naval appropriation bill on Wednesday?

Mr. MONDELL. I think not. It will be disposed of before that time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. In what shape will the gentleman's request be if the point of order be sustained that the resolution in regard to the Austrian debt is not privileged?

Mr. MONDELL. Consideration of the Austrian resolution, if it is brought up. Of course, if it is held out of order, this bill would then be considered.

Mr. WALSH. It would not follow it then.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman, who seems to take a different view, can suggest some way different in which I can present a request that after the Austrian debt resolution is disposed of, one way or another, we can consider the other bill——

Mr. WALSH. I am not criticizing the form in which the gentleman presented his request, but I presume he wanted the hospital bill considered, and in the form in which he stated his request, if the Austrian resolution is held not privileged, the hospital bill would not come up for consideration.

Mr. MONDELL. It seems to be a little difficult to present these requests so that gentlemen understand them. I think I made that very plain, that after we have disposed of the Austrian resolution one way or another, either by considering it or by deciding not to consider it, we can take up the other bill.

Mr. GARNER. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that this bill may be in order to call up at any time under the rules of the House? Then you have got a privileged status.

Mr. MONDELL. If that pleases the gentleman better——

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] suggested that this would not interfere with the taking up of the naval bill on Wednesday. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it is his intention to suspend Calendar Wednesday next week?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we ought to do that, although the request that I have made does not involve that question; I think we ought to do it, because the naval bill will be ready for consideration, and I think ought to be considered.

Mr. KING. Will there be an opportunity for Calendar Wednesday within the near future?

Mr. MONDELL. Very soon. We hope to consider the matter the gentleman is interested in.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the hospital bill be given a privileged status.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to be given a privileged status. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, is that the bill that is going to turn over this hospitalization to the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, I think, knows what the bill contains. I suppose there will be some difference of opinion in regard to the provisions of the bill. We are simply asking an opportunity for its consideration.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not see any majority members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce here who have handled most of the matter.

Mr. MONDELL. I have talked the matter over with the members of the committee and they are all very anxious to have the bill considered at the earliest possible date.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, they did not talk that way to me. But it is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the question in connection with this Austrian loan resolution that I think deserves the very thoughtful consideration of the Members of the House is this: If it be a privileged bill, it is privileged because it is a revenue proposition, coming within the constitutional provision and the provision of the rule. Now, if it be a revenue bill, it has originated in the wrong body under the Constitution.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who are going to Muscle Shoals may be absent five days on official business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the members of the Committee on Military Affairs may be excused for five days on official business. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

577. By Mr. GALLIVAN: Memorial of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, favoring an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor of women and minors; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ROSSDALE: Memorial of the Senate of the State of New York, urging that the navy yard at Brooklyn, N. Y., be retained and continued in full operation; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BEEDY: A bill (H. R. 11059) to refund to John B. Keating customs tax erroneously and illegally collected; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CHINDBLOM: A bill (H. R. 11060) for the relief of Alfred E. Staps; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi: A bill (H. R. 11061) for the relief of the estate of John D. Thomas, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OGDEN: A bill (H. R. 11062) for the relief of Pirtle Handley; to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 27, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

SUPPLEMENTARY FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of Executive O, the four-power supplementary agreement.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the agreement submitted by the President of the United States between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions, and defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cameron	Cummins	Fletcher
Ball	Capper	Dial	France
Borah	Caraway	Edge	Gerry
Bursum	Colt	Ernst	Gooding
Calder	Culberson	Fernald	Hale
Harris	McNary	Rawson	Underwood
Harrison	Moses	Robinson	Wadsworth
Hitchcock	Nelson	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Jones, Wash.	New	Shields	Warren
Kellogg	Oddie	Simmons	Watson, Ga.
Keyes	Overman	Spencer	Weller
King	Page	Stanley	Williams
La Follette	Phipps	Sterling	Willis
Lenroot	Pittman	Sutherland
Lodge	Poindexter	Townsend

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are engaged in the work of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, on Saturday I gave way somewhat before I had finished in order that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] might make his address. I merely wish to conclude now by drawing attention to some additional confusion which has arisen with regard to the treatment of the treaties.

I do not know whether those in charge of the treaties will so consider it, but it seems to me it is rather unusual for such a radical difference to exist between the President of the United States and the Secretary of State on these documents. There exists a difference almost as notable as existed in the interpretation of the four-power treaty itself, when the President of the United States interpreted it as not applying to the Japanese mainland, whereas his Secretary of State declared emphatically that it was drawn for the purpose of including within its terms the Japanese mainland.

Now, I call attention to the difference which exists at the present time between the President of the United States and the Secretary of State with regard to these treaties. The Secretary of State, when the treaties were turned over by him and formally reported, declared that they were six in number. The President of the United States, when he came before the Senate and presented the treaties to us, declared that they were seven in number, and when he declared that they were seven in number, as will be seen on page 10 of the printed document, he invited the prompt approval of all of them. He did not invite the approval of six of them, but all of them, and all of them, as listed by the President of the United States, certainly included the declaration which the Senate on Friday entirely ignored.

Not only that, but on page 11 of the President's address it appears that the President said:

> If to all of these the Senate will not advise and consent, then it will be futile to try again.

Evidently the President must have included in that the declaration which the Senate ignored on Friday last.

But while the President of the United States thus referred to the treaties as seven in number, his Secretary of State, when he compiled them for transmission to the Senate of the United States, treated them as only six in number, and he bound up with the document itself the declaration which relates to the four-power treaty. I did not personally examine the official manuscript. When I applied to the executive clerk of the Senate to examine it, I found that it had already been returned to the White House, and therefore neither the four-power treaty nor the declaration which Secretary Hughes says is a part of it and which the President says is a separate treaty can be found within the possession of the Senate at the present time.

This is rather a startling situation, the Chief Executive of the United States declaring that the declaration is a separate treaty, his Secretary of State declaring that it belongs to and is a part of the four-power treaty, one declaring that there are six treaties and the other declaring that there are seven treaties, and the leader of the Republican majority of the Senate declaring that the declaration is not even a part of the four-power treaty. Here is the President of the United States signifying that it is a separate treaty. Here is the Secretary of State giving it to us as a part of the four-power treaty. Here is the Republican leader on the floor of the Senate declaring that it is not even a part of the four-power treaty and has not the dignity of a treaty at all; that it was not signed officially by the representatives of the United States nor by the representatives of any other country. He declares that the interpretation which they therein expressed was not official but was merely personal, until his attention is drawn to the fact that in making the interpretation they do not assert that it is their interpretation, but do assert that it is the interpretation of the signatory powers themselves.

I do not know what can be done about this matter, but it seems to me that it has developed into a condition of confusion worse confounded. Are you going to treat them as seven treaties in accordance with the President's statement made here before the Senate, or are you going to treat them as six treaties according to the statement made by the Secretary of State? If you treat them as seven treaties you must make a separate ratification of the declaration, and, in order to do that you have got to tear asunder the document which the Secretary of State sent here and which has now been returned to the White House. On the other hand, if you fail to treat the declaration as worthy of the consideration of the Senate, what becomes of the President's official communication to the Senate that it is a treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may have alluded to it, but I notice that Senate Document 125, which, I think, was made a Senate document on motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], includes all of the treaties. Senators will notice that on the second page the declaration accompanying the four-power treaty is listed as No. 4 among the seven treaties mentioned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; and that adds another to the complications of the situation. That official manuscript was sent to the Senate and was the document which was acted upon. What Senators read and examined and what was ratified apparently, or nominally at least, by the vote of the Senate, is designated as Executive N. The resolution of ratification states:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding.

That is, what was ostensibly ratified by the action of the Senate on Friday. This is "Executive N"; and before the ratification resolution was attached to it, and just ahead of the resolution of ratification, appears this declaration, which was a part of the treaty, according to the Secretary of State, and was bound with the official copy of the treaty which was sent to the Senate, and it has gone back to the White House as a part of the official copy of the treaty for the President's act of ratification.

I do not know how the Senate is going to untangle that situation or whether the Senator from Massachusetts is going to adopt the strong-arm method of simply letting the thing go as it is now with all of these doubts and contradictions and inconsistencies attached to it. I will venture to say that this is the first time in the history of any deliberative body or of any body authorizing ratification where such a tangle has developed in the final act of ratification of a most important and controverted document.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he still contends that if it was a part of the treaty it was not ratified by the resolution of ratification?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is my view.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator point out any rule that was violated in the consideration of the treaty, assuming that the declaration was included in the resolution of ratification?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think it is necessary for me to point that out. If the Senator from Wisconsin proposes deliberately before an intelligent country to take the position that the Senate of the United States may ratify a treaty without reading it, I have not any controversy with him. I am willing to submit that to the intelligence of the country. If the Senator from Wisconsin wants, on his responsibility as a Senator, to take the position here that there is a valid and proper ratification of the treaty without reading it, he is welcome to that opinion. I stand my ground that it is beneath the dignity and beneath the honesty of a legislative body to pretend that it has ratified a document when it has not even read it.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Senator from Nebraska prepared to state that the declaration was not read by the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not as yet heard any controversy on that subject. I noticed the omission of its reading at the time.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that is quite important in view of the statement which the Senator makes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It might be.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish, further, to ask the Senator whether there was any offer of an amendment or any request for further consideration when, under the rules of the Senate, it was open to consideration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The matter was called by me to the attention of the Senate when there still remained time to act.

Mr. LENROOT. Not without violating the rule of the Senate. The Senator will remember the treaty had passed the stage of amendment, it had passed the stage of reservation, when the Senator called the attention of the Senate to the matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It had not been submitted for amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The treaty had passed the stage of amendment and reservation under the rules of the Senate before the Senator from Nebraska ever raised this question.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It had not been done by my act. I am not responsible for the failure to read the treaty or to submit to the Senate the declaration.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. I have not heard anyone assert that it was read.

Mr. LODGE. I assert that it was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not read. I know the records may now show that it was read, but, as a matter of fact, it was not read.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, the Secretary of the Senate is unable to reply on the floor of the Senate——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts may reply.

Mr. LODGE. I say to the Senate that it was read and read as a declaration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not read at the time we passed upon the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It was read at the time the treaty was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When?

Mr. LODGE. When the treaty was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On Friday?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, not on Friday. The treaty was not read on Friday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There we have a sample——

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted in that way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have the floor; the Senator will have to acknowledge that.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nebraska asked me a question, which I started to answer, and before I get the words out of my mouth the Senator intervenes. I wanted to say that the declaration was read when the treaty was read, which was the first thing done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is probable; but there is an attempt now to give the impression that it was read on Friday when it was acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. There is no attempt to give any such impression as that. The Senator did not allow me to finish my statement. It was read when the treaty was read; the Senator has been saying it was not read, when as a matter of fact it was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I again assert that when the treaty was before the Senate on Friday to be read to the Senate paragraph by paragraph for amendment for the first time this particular declaration was not read, and when the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts get up here and say it was read they are trying to give the impression that it was read on Friday, when technically they are correct, because it was read a week or so ago.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator has no right to say what impression the Senator from Wisconsin and I are trying to give. We are trying to give no impression except the truth, that the declaration was read when the whole treaty was read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course it was.

Mr. LODGE. I have never tried to give any impression that it was read on Friday, for not to my knowledge was it read on Friday.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not read on Friday.

Mr. LODGE. I never have suggested that it was.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On Friday I called attention to the fact that it was not read, and no one rose to assert that it had been read.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will examine the rule, he will find there is nothing in the rule that requires a treaty to be read a second time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The rule of the Senate with reference to treaties has been lived up to heretofore, and it was lived up to in this instance, so far as the first, second, third, and fourth articles of the treaty were concerned, on Friday.

Mr. LODGE. The declaration is not an article of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not assumed by the other side that there was any possibility of omitting the reading under the rule on page 40.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. After we had adopted the treaty section by section, each section being required to be read, as it was read for the information of the Senate—when that was done did not the Senator ask that the so-called declaration be read?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that we might act upon it as we had acted upon the different sections and articles of the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I gave Senators an opportunity to have it read.

Mr. LENROOT. At what point?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. At a point before we voted on the resolution of ratification.

Mr. LENROOT. After, under the rules, the treaty had passed beyond the stage of consideration for amendments or reservations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not recall as to that.

Mr. LENROOT. The record will so show.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not recall that fact, but I do recall that the Senator from Nebraska before we had acted upon the resolution of ratification asked that the declaration, so called, be read, and he asked that it be read in order that we might act upon it——

Mr. LENROOT. He did not, and he could not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Just as we had acted upon the other articles of the treaty. My recollection is that the Senator from Massachusetts said it was not necessary that it should be read; that it was not a part of the treaty; that it was merely the declaration of the intent of the makers of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, let me state what the rule is with regard to the ratification of treaties, and let us ascertain how nearly it has been lived up to in this instance. Rule XXXVII provides:

EXECUTIVE SESSION—PROCEEDINGS OF TREATIES.

1. When a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification, it shall be read a first time—

That was done weeks ago. At that time the declaration was read as a part of the treaty, and that it was read as a part of the treaty is only another proof that it was in fact a part of the treaty as negotiated. It was read; there was no omission there—and no motion in respect to it shall be in order, except to refer it to a committee, to print it in confidence for the use of the Senate, to remove the injunction of secrecy, or to consider it in open executive session.

That was done—

When a treaty is reported from a committee with or without amendment, it shall, unless the Senate unanimously otherwise direct, lie one day for consideration.

That was done; in fact, there were a number of days intervening—

After which it may be read a second time.

Mr. KELLOGG. It "may be read a second time."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it "may be," but the rule does not say that "a part of it may be." When it is said that "it may be read," that means that if it is read at all it shall all be read and not a part of it. It can not be assumed that that rule was intended to deceive people.

After which it may be read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole, when it shall be proceeded with by articles, and the amendments reported by the committee shall be first acted upon, after which other amendments may be proposed; and when through with, the proceedings had as in Committee of the Whole shall be reported to the Senate, when the question shall be, if the treaty be amended, "Will the Senate concur in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole?" And the amendments may be taken separately, or in gross, if no Senator shall object; after which new amendments may be proposed. At any stage of such proceedings the Senate may remove the injunction of secrecy from the treaty, or proceed with its consideration in open executive session.

That was done.

The decisions thus made shall be reduced to the form of a resolution of ratification, with or without amendments, as the case may be, which shall be proposed on a subsequent day, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate determine otherwise; at which stage no amendment shall be received, unless by unanimous consent.

On the final question to advise and consent to the ratification in the form agreed to, the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall be necessary to determine it in the affirmative; but all other motions and questions upon a treaty shall be decided by a majority vote, except a motion to postpone indefinitely, which shall be decided by a vote of two-thirds.

Now, Mr. President, the fact which the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts have developed, that when the treaty came to the Senate and before it went to the committee it was read as a whole, including the declaration, only adds another complication to the situation. That is to say, the Senate itself has treated that declaration as a part of the treaty in having it read to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it is conclusive that the President of the United States sent it up here as a part of the treaty, because it could not have been read as a part of the treaty unless the President had sent it up in that way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is true, and it shows in the official publication here, Executive N; and this was prepared, as I am told, not by the Senate but by the authority of the State Department, and may be considered as official. It is prepared in such a way that this declaration is a part of the treaty, and the Senate treated it as a part of the treaty when it was first read; but when it was first read it was not open to amendment. When it was first read, it was not before the Senate for adoption. When it was first read, it was read only for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. When it really came before the Senate to be read a second time, then, under the rules of the Senate, it had to be read article by article, and that is done for the purpose of giving an opportunity for approval——

Mr. LODGE. Is this an article of the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it is an article of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Is it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an article of the treaty, undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. It is not so numbered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It ought to have been. I will say to the Senator what ought to have been done with it. It should have been put in as a separate article, above the signatures. Generally, when representatives of the United States have negotiated a treaty and have appended a declaration similar to this, they have not called it a declaration; they have called it an article; but the fact that you fail to call it an article does not detract from its being an article. After you have signed a promissory note, if you call it something else, it is a promissory note just the same. That declaratory statement, signed upon the same day the treaty was signed, signed by the same representatives that signed the treaty, signed in the names of the same Governments that negotiated the treaty, has exactly the same force and effect as if it were written above the original signatures.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not know that I understand the position of the Senator. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator to claim just now that this is a part of the treaty. Is that his contention?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I claim that it was so negotiated, that it was so sent here by the Secretary of State, and that it was read to the Senate the first time as a part of the treaty; but I also claim that the President treated it as a separate treaty, and that on the final conclusion the Senate did not act upon it as a part of the treaty. In other words, what I claim is that you have a mess of confusion worse confounded here and nobody can tell what it is.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is not the question I asked the Senator. Is the Senator willing to answer the question: Is it or is it not a part of the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I say it was negotiated as a part of the treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. But is it, in the Senator's opinion, a part of it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My opinion has been scouted here. Probably it would not be of any value.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator declines to answer that question, then, does he?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been exonerated from the charge of being a lawyer. The Senator from Wisconsin kindly did that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator is a lawyer, I beg his pardon. I did not know he was. I did not mean to reflect on him in any way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I accept the exoneration. I am looking at this thing as a Senator from my State and treating it as one of the solemn acts of the Senate to ratify a treaty; and I tell you that you have gotten it into a condition of confusion now where perhaps no man can tell whether it is a part of the treaty or not. Your President has treated it as not a part of the treaty. Your Secretary of State has treated it as a part of the treaty. The Senate at first treated it as a part of the treaty, but finally they treated it as not a part of the treaty. The leader of the Republican majority, the Senator from Massachusetts, declared here emphatically and repeatedly that it was not a part of the treaty, and so I do not know; it is hard to tell what it is. It has had such treatment since it came in here that probably even a Philadelphia lawyer or a constitutional lawyer from Wisconsin might not be able to tell exactly what it is at the present time.

Mr. KING. Why does not the Senator call it a stepchild?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will tell you what I would call it. If the Senator from Massachusetts carries out the statement he made here the other day and offers this for ratification as a separate document, I shall declare it a bobtail treaty, if such a document might be said to exist. It has neither beginning nor end.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. Is not this the position which the Senator takes about that matter, as I understand, that if it is a part of the treaty it is a part that never has been acted on?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It never has been acted on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly it never has been ratified by the Senate knowingly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has neither been ratified nor rejected. It is a nondescript, hanging between heaven and earth. It is neither one thing nor the other.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator claim, although the rule requires a treaty to be read, that if the Senate should not have it read but should proceed without objection to a final vote and ratify the treaty, the ratification is not valid?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have made that claim, but I have been scouted; and what I am saying now is this——

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator still make that claim?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I claim that you have the worst thing that can possibly happen to a treaty. You have it shrouded in a great cloud of doubt and uncertainty, and you have an absolute invitation to controversy over this treaty which has been made for the purpose of making things certain. Not only that, but if this declaration has not been ratified and is not to be ratified we have lost the thing that has been considered most important in dealing with Japan—that is to say, the reservation of the immigration question—so that it can not possibly be claimed even to be within the realm of international negotiations. That has been remarked here as a matter of vast importance.

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] made a large part of his speech ostensibly for the knowledge of his constituents out on the Pacific coast, and assured them that this treaty protected the people of the United States on the Pacific coast from every possible danger; that Japan could in the future claim the immigration question as a subject for international consideration. Now, you have wiped that out. That is in the declaration, and you have not ratified it. You have not even submitted it to the Senate. It was here as a part of that document. It has gone back to the White House nominally as a part of that document. The President has told us officially that it is not a part of the document. He has told us that it was a separate treaty. So you have that difference of opinion between your Secretary of State and your President. You have the Senate acting in two ways upon it—first, acting upon it as a part of the treaty, then acting upon the document as not a part of the treaty—and if you can unravel that tangle it is up to you to do so. You may prefer to leave it as a matter of doubt. If you do, in my opinion you will commit an egregious blunder. My own judgment is that the only thing to be done is to move to reconsider and bring the treaty back here and ratify it in the proper way. For one I should be in favor of prompt action upon it, without any undue delay.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Does the Senator know whether, in returning the ratified treaty to the President, the records show that this declaration was returned as a part of the ratified treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was informed by the executive secretary, who has charge of these documents, that it came to the Senate bound together exactly as it was printed here, and that it was returned to the White House in the same way, with the resolution of ratification attached.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the returned copy that went back to the President include these declarations about the mandated islands and domestic questions?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does.

Mr. SIMMONS. As returned to the President?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does.

Mr. LENROOT. When the Senator states that it was bound together will he not explain? I take it he knows what the fact is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is bound together in the same covers, and this printed copy was really formed by the State Department, with the declaration so attached to the treaty that there was not room for a resolution of ratification, and the resolution of ratification necessarily had to come following this declaration. You have done that in the copy before the Senate and you have your resolution of ratification following the declaration, and you did not read the declaration.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, did the Senator ascertain that so far as the treaty proper was concerned there was ample space upon that page to have included the declaration, but the declaration was upon a separate page, attached with a loose clip?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Secretary told me they were all bound together in one document. That is all he said to me. I was not able to cross-examine him; and it had already been sent up to the White House before we went into session on Saturday.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether a proper interpretation of the treaty—and when I say "treaty," I mean that part which is found above the first signatures of the delegates, and which would embrace articles 1, 2, 3, and 4—would lead to the conclusion, irresistibly and conclusively, that the mandated islands in the Pacific were a part of the insular possessions and insular dominions of Great Britain and Japan?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Without the declaration?

Mr. KING. Assuming that there was no declaration at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; of course not.

Mr. KING. It is clear, as I read the Versailles treaty, that wherever the legal title is in regard to the mandated territories, the mandatories hold as trustees, and are subject in the exercise of that trust to the League of Nations. It would seem, if that be true, that a dispute or a controversy could legitimately arise as to whether the insular possessions and insular dominions embrace the mandated territories. Assume that the mandated territories are not embraced within the treaty; then, obviously, in order to get them in the treaty another treaty would have to be drawn supplemental to it. It might be executed contemporaneously with this or subsequently. If executed contemporaneously, then, whether it was a part of this treaty or not, it ought to be considered at the same time—that is to say, following it—and receive ratification or rejection as if it were a separate treaty.

It does seem to me that this declaratory statement either constitutes a separate treaty, or it is a part of this treaty, or it relates to the treaty, and may be dealt with as modifying and changing the original treaty, and to that extent should be construed as a part of the original treaty; but, in any event, I do not see how Senators can contend that it would not need to be ratified. It would have to receive the same formal sanction by the Senate as that part of the treaty which seems to exclude mandated territory from the operation of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is evident that the President of the United States treated this matter as one of very serious concern. He says:

> The treaties submitted, seven in number, are—
> The covenant of limitation to naval armament between our Republic, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan.
> The treaty between the same powers in relation to the use of submarines and noxious gases in warfare.
> The treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and their insular dominions in the Pacific.
> A declaration accompanying the four-power treaty reserving American rights in mandated territory.
> An agreement supplementary to the four-power treaty defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan.
> A treaty between the nine powers in the conference relating to principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China.
> A treaty between the nine powers relating to Chinese customs tariff.

Mr. President, the President of the United States gave to this declaration the same dignity and importance that he gave to every one of the other treaties submitted at that time. He did that, and he asked the Senate when he submitted them to give consent to the ratification of all of them. He said if to all the Senate will not consent, it is futile again to make an attempt to adjust things in this way.

The Secretary of State, as I have already explained, so connected the declaration with the treaty as to call it one, and he bound them into one document and sent them here for action at the same time. They were read to the Senate as one document and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations as one document. Yet when it came to the reading of the treaty in detail, in order that Senators might have an opportunity to offer amendments, this important declaration was entirely ignored and dropped out.

I supposed it was an oversight. I assume it was still an oversight, and I could not understand then why the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] or the great constitutional lawyer from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] did not take the necessary parliamentary steps to have the error cured at the time, as it could have been, in 30 minutes; but it was passed over, and we were then left in this beautiful doubt and uncertainty, and the more you examine it the more uncertain it becomes. A part of the time the Senate has followed the interpretation of the President of the United States that there are seven treaties; a part of the time it has followed the interpretation of the Secretary of State that there are only six treaties, and I do not know but what now we are going to have still another interpretation by the Senate, that the declaration is nothing at all and can be dropped out absolutely and forgotten. That will be the result if the action I have suggested is not taken, and if that is the result, the United States is going to lose the most important reservation that is made in this treaty. It is going to leave Japan to claim in the future, as she has claimed for years in the past, that the matter of immigration in which her nationals are involved is a matter which she has a right to discuss with us as an international question.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if that is not especially true in view of the fact that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] offered a resolution in which, among other things, it is provided:

> And that the United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, etc.

That was voted down, and the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], voted against it, as well as all Republican Senators except four. Might that not be construed as the action of the Senate, in view of the fact that nothing was done about the declaration?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly Japan would be in a position to claim that the declaration, which included the reservation covering domestic questions, was dropped out by the Senate, and that when a Senator rose and specifically demanded that it be put in the Senate voted not to put it in, thus practically putting the United States in the position of assenting to domestic questions, like immigration, becoming a matter of international controversy.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. When the Senator voted against a similar reservation in the Versailles treaty, did he assent to the proposition that Japan would submit to the League of Nations domestic questions, such as immigration?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator is a little mistaken in his facts. I assented to the idea that domestic questions should be exempt, and they were exempted in the treaty through the personal efforts of President Wilson at that time.

Mr. LENROOT. Only in case the council, in which we would not have a voice, should decide that it was a domestic question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I even assented later on to the specific mention of immigration, and I assented also to its being decided exclusively by the United States, and I quite approve this declaration to the same effect.

Mr. LENROOT. One other question. Did not the Senator vote to ratify the Versailles treaty without any reservation relating to immigration?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I cast a great many votes on that treaty, but we finally came to a compromise, and I gave my consent to that idea. The only nation in the world with which we have this controversy is Japan, and it is the one big thing over which we have had trouble with Japan in the past, and it was the only important reservation put into this treaty. It was put in at the demand of the American delegates, and it is the one thing in that treaty which really gives protection to the United States.

Senators say there has been a great menace and danger of trouble between the United States and Japan in the Pacific Ocean. What is it over? It is over the immigration question. That has been the burning cause of trouble. We have had weeks of negotiations with Japan over that. We have had agitation running into the years over that question. It is the one thing Japan has clung to and insisted on in its controversies with the United States. Yet here, in this declaration, you deliberately drop it out and allow it to go for naught.

It may be that the Senator from Massachusetts can secure a separate ratification of this declaration. I certainly would not oppose it if it were brought in for ratification. I would vote for it; but I warn you now, as I warned you on Saturday, that Japan is not likely to ratify it as a separate document. If we treat it as a separate document and ratify it, we leave it in the power of Japan to say no. Japan then will be able to ratify the document which we are supposed to have ratified on Friday, and shake her fingers at us as far as the reservation covering immigration is concerned, because Japan no longer has any interest in this declaration.

Japan is protected in what she wants in this supplementary treaty, which is now theoretically before the Senate. The only thing the United States got in that treaty was the reservation regarding immigration, and you dropped it out, and if you undertake to ratify it as a separate agreement you expose yourselves to the probability that Japan will say, "No; we will ratify the treaty as the Senate ratified it on Friday, and stop there." If you want to take your chances of that, all right. I certainly have done what I thought was my duty in calling the attention of the Senate to this great oversight which occurred on Friday. If there had not been so much nervous haste to come to a vote, you could have cured the defect at that time. You could have cured it by a reservation, or you could have cured it by a motion to recommit the treaty to the Committee of the Whole, and voted on it there without any debate. You can still do it, if you want to, by a motion to reconsider; but any other course is going to leave this treaty shrouded in doubt and uncertainty, and an inevitable subject for debate and controversy with Japan in the future on the very question which has troubled the two countries so much in the past.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] I want to read the colloquy which took place just before the vote on the resolution of ratification.

It is very important that it should be definitely and finally settled, if possible, in a way not open to future controversy and dispute, as to whether the so-called supplementary declaration by the signatories to the treaty is a part of the treaty or is not a part of the treaty. Upon the very threshold of that controversy, Mr. President, we have a very pronounced disagreement between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who was one of the delegates who negotiated this treaty, on the one hand, and the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I assume the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], judging from what they have stated here to-day, on the other, as to whether this declaration referring to the mandated islands and domestic questions is or is not a part of this treaty. Each of these gentlemen has taken a very active part in the discussion. Each of them has given very thorough consideration to all the details of this treaty, and yet this essential and important question—are or are not these two declarations a part of this treaty—is a matter of controversy and dispute between the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and these two distinguished Senators, who have taken such an active and important part in connection with this whole controversy. In that dispute, out of which this difference of opinion grows, I find the President of the Senate aligned with the Senator from Massachusetts in his contention.

I do not know what the Senator from Massachusetts contends now, but if he did not contend at the time this question was raised and presented to the Senate in an acute form that these two declarations were not a part of the treaty, then I can not understand the language used by him upon the floor of the Senate. If the President of the Senate did not so rule, I can not understand the meaning of English language. Here is the colloquy, and I want to present it all together. After I finish reading this I shall desire to submit some remarks to the Senate with reference to this question. The colloquy is as follows:

> The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments, the resolution of ratification will now be read.
> The Assistant Secretary read as follows:
> "Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive N, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean, concluded at Washington, December 13, 1921, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification.
> "The United States understands that under the statement in the preamble or under the terms of this treaty there is no commitment to armed force, no alliance, no obligation to join in any defense."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the Chair whether the resolution of ratification as read will, if adopted by the constitutional majority, apply to the following language of the treaty:

"In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers:

"1. That the treaty shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: provided, however, that the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.

"2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers."

Then, evidently replying to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, which, I repeat, was "whether the resolution of ratification as read will, if adopted by the constitutional majority, apply to the following language of the treaty," the Vice President said:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair undersands that that is the declaration of the signatory powers and not a part of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I beg to inquire when opportunity will be given to offer amendments to that declaration?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that it is open to amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it changes the meaning of the treaty, and it was adopted on the same day with the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this discussion is out of order under the unanimous-consent agreement. The Chair has ruled correctly.

The Chair had ruled that it was not a part of the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has answered the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LODGE. Regular order!

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I only want a ruling by the Chair. Does the Chair rule that the resolution of ratification ratifies this declaration which has been made a part of the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate agreed that immediately after the reservations and amendments that might be pending should be acted upon it would then vote upon the resolution of ratification. That has been presented and is now before the Senate. The matter to which the Senator from Nebraska alludes is not the resolution of ratification, and is not pending as an amendment to the resolution of ratification.

Mr. REED. What is it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should judge from its being signed by the delegates to the international conference that it was their interpretation of the treaty, but it would be just as pertinent to make the President's address to the Senate a part of the resolution of ratification as to make the interpretation of those who framed the treaty. I make the point of order that the unanimous-consent agreement compels a vote unless there are other amendments or reservations to be offered to the resolution of ratification.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disputing that. I am simply seeking to get a ruling of the Chair to go into the RECORD; and if the Chair does not care to hear me on that subject, I, of course, shall desist at once. It is for the Chair to say whether he desires to hear me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution of ratification is before the Senate, and it is for the Chair to say whether the inquiry raised by the Senator presents a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the position of the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Chair will permit me, I will add one other thing. I am calling it to the attention of the Chair at this time because under the rules of the Senate it is required that the treaty shall be read, and this portion has not been read.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a part of the treaty. That is why it has not been read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was transmitted to the Senate by the President as a part of the treaty——

Mr. LODGE. It was not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it is printed with the treaty in advance of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, all this debate is out of order; but the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska was not reported as a part of the treaty, and is not a part of the treaty. It is merely a declaration of the understanding and intent of the signatories of the treaty.

There we have three separate distinct categorical statements—the Senator from Massachusetts that the declaration had not constituted and is not a part of the treaty, the Chair joining in with a ruling, and the Senator from Massachusetts then heartily approving the ruling of the Chair. Yet to-day, when the Senator from Nebraska rises in his place and asks that this tangle be straightened out, and shows by argument that seems to me to be very conclusive that there had been no ratification of this declaration by the Senate—certainly no ratification by the Senate with its knowledge—it having been understood at the time we were considering the resolution of ratification that we were not acting upon it, it having been understood at that time that it was not a part of the treaty and did not require action of the Senate, but was in the nature of an interpretation by the delegates to the convention—when the Senator from Nebraska is making that contention, supported, as I think, by the RECORD, conclusively proven by the rulings of the Chair and the declarations of the Senator in charge of the treaty as well as the declarations of that great lawyer from Connecticut, Mr. BRANDEGEE—the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is confronted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who are evidently ready for the fray and prepared to take a position designed to lift the matter out of the fog of doubt in which it is involved, and who assert that the declaration is a part of the treaty, and that in ratifying the treaty we ratified the declaration.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure the Senator does not wish to misrepresent my position.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that is not the Senator's position, I certainly misunderstood it.

Mr. LENROOT. The position I took was that if it be a part of the treaty, as the Senator from Nebraska contended last Saturday, it was ratified by the resolution; that was all. I did not take the position that it was a part of the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not contend that it was a part of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not then.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator now contend that it is a part of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. I said I took the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, one of the negotiators of the treaty, that it was a separate instrument, a separate document.

Mr. SIMMONS. What does the Senator regard it, then, if it is not a part of the treaty and has not been ratified as such? In what category does the Senator put it?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say that when one examines the document itself and finds this declaration was not put in the form of a treaty, that it had merely the individual signatures of the parties, I am inclined to think that it was merely a construction solemnly entered into by the representatives of the four different powers. It was transmitted to the Senate. It can be ratified by the Senate, as agreements and declarations have been ratified heretofore that have not been in the form of treaties. Whether it is ratified or not, I do not think it makes the slightest difference, because every one of the four powers at all times will give to the treaty proper the construction that has been given by the negotiators who entered into it in writing for them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that the Senator from Wisconsin takes that position. I thought that he contended, and I think probably that was the view of the Senator from Nebraska—at least I judged so from the line of his answer—that it was a part of the treaty and that it had been ratified and that we need not further concern ourselves about it. But now I understand the Senator did not mean that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The contention arose Saturday during the argument made by the Senator from Nebraska that there had been no valid ratification whatever of the four-power treaty because the declaration had not been read and considered under the rules of the Senate. I took the position that if it was a part of the treaty it was covered by the resolution and was a valid ratification of the treaty in law; but I did not take the position that it was a part of the treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, I think the situation is clarified. It is now conceded by all on the other side that the declaration about these two very important questions, one of them the paramount question, in my judgment, in connection with all the Pacific questions, are not a part of the treaty and that we have not in ratifying the treaty ratified them. Therefore, Mr. President, not being a part of the treaty and not having been ratified, the declarations must stand upon their own bottoms and go for what they are worth.

I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I do not agree with him that they are a part of the treaty. I have never thought they were a part of the treaty. I thought we could easily make them a part of the treaty by voting to include them in the treaty. They have been negotiated in the form of a treaty, and we could have voted to include them in the treaty, but we did not do it.

Although they were negotiated at the same time, signed by the same people, and were intended to be a supplement to it, yet they were not made a part of the treaty, and in order that they should be a part of the treaty it would have been necessary to have included them in the resolution of ratification, reading them as we did other parts of the treaty, adopting them as we did other parts of the treaty, and including them in the resolution of ratification.

Therefore, my contention is that the declaratory statement has not been ratified and is not a part of the treaty. If it is desirable to have it become a part of the treaty among the four powers, we should proceed to ratify it as a treaty agreed upon among the four powers, or we should proceed to make another treaty dealing with those questions there involved.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was not this the position of the Senator from Nebraska? I state it though he is present, because I rather share in the view which he expressed. I interpreted his view to be that while these were two separate documents, two separate treaties, in view of the fact that they related to the same subject matter and were executed contemporaneously, one with a view to modify and change if not to qualify the other, that in that sense they were one treaty dealing with one subject matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not disagree with the Senator. I think they ought to have been treated as one treaty, and we ought to have ratified them as one treaty. But we did not do it, and my contention now is that having ratified the original treaty, and not having ratified the supplemental treaty, to call it so, it is a treaty not yet ratified, and is such because the other side would not permit us to act upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the developments of this morning, that we really did both. We received them as one treaty, they were read to the Senate as one treaty, they were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations as one treaty, and they were reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Senate as one treaty.

Mr. SIMMONS. But does not the Senator agree with me that they have not been ratified as a part of the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I agree with the Senator fully as to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all I am contending.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Senator from Wisconsin never seems to be able to catch my meaning. I said the negotiators treated them as one treaty; and I can add to that now by saying that the Secretary of State treated them as one treaty; the Senate when it had them read treated them as one treaty; the committee which reported them to the Senate treated them as one treaty; and the only time when we amputated that portion of it was when it came to the reading section by section, and voting upon them, and then we treated them as two. We have been on both sides of the fence.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. We ratified a part of the treaty, but not the other part of it. That is what has happened.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. I am forcibly reminded of an incident we may well recall at this time. In the North Sea, off the coast a short distance from the mainland, is an island smaller than the island of Sakhalin, long regarded as a rough and worthless promontory. When the attention of the House of Commons was called to the fact that the ceding of Helgoland, that barren backbone of granite in the North Sea, might affect the destinies of the world, the warning was passed by with cavalier unconcern and contempt by that body. To-day we have another island, the island of Sakhalin, half of which is owned and all of which is held by Japan. It is in a way to Russia-Japan what Helgoland was to Germany-Great Britain. It is a point of vantage, and will be the first scene of armed hostilities in the almost certain event of a resort to arms by these powerful nations. No man who has given even a cursory study to this question can fail to be apprehensive, and in our position to be more or less appalled by the imminence of hostilities, if hostilities are not now going on, between those two countries.

The lower part of the island of Sakhalin belonging to Japan is affected by the four-power treaty, and its destiny will be determined by the adoption or rejection of the pending supplementary treaty. It appears to me, Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield, that the other countries of the world understand much more distinctly than do we the vital if not the tragic importance of certainty in any treaty touching our relations to this island.

The Senator will remember that when the treaty was proposed to the plenary council the learned Senator from Massachusetts, in his inimitable way, gave us another instance of his poetic erudition by his beautiful talk about the harmless and lovely little islands—

> Sprinkled isles,
> Lily on lily that o'erlace the sea.

Sakhalin is not a lily, but is a powder house. When the President blandly advised the newspaper men that, of course, we had not guaranteed the integrity of the mainland of Japan we were somewhat reassured for an hour or two. Then it was that the American representatives hastened to the White House to tell the President that he had been beguiled by the rhetoric of the Senator from Massachusetts and had not followed the negotiations of his own representatives; that this language meant more than it purported to mean, and that they had guaranteed, so far as article 2 of the treaty was concerned, the territorial integrity and political independence not only of Japan but, what is infinitely worse, of Japan's part of the island of Sakhalin. Something had to be done or the treaty was gone. You could not have whipped, you could not have lashed, 11 Democrats into a guaranty of the territorial integrity and political independence or any other guaranty of this Prussia of the Orient, the Government of Japan itself and the islands of Japan. This assurance was given. I have not seen anything like it in politics since the old days when we used to go to the country fairs and they would show you the three peas—"now you see it and now you don't see it." The President did not see it; perhaps Secretary Hughes and his confrères did.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], if the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me, throws a startling new light upon this subject. This declaratory statement was signed, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] tells us, before the treaty itself was signed. The Senator from Missouri tells us—

> When that treaty was signed it was signed by 19 plenipotentiaries, who acted for the President of the United States, for His Majesty the King of Great Britain, for the President of France, and for the Emperor of Japan. They were acting as plenipotentiaries. When they signed in that capacity they signed officially; and the Senator from Nebraska will find, on looking at the treaty, that each affixed his individual seal. They were acting in an official capacity and formulated a treaty.
> When that treaty was signed and completed with such formality, the same 19 men, as individuals, not as plenipotentiaries, not even indicating that they were acting, as they did in signing the treaty, by the authority of their Governments, but acting as individuals and without seal, without the formalities of execution, expressed their interpretation of what their respective Governments meant by that treaty. Is there not a distinct difference? One is an official treaty; the other is the declaration of the same men, but not acting officially, as to what that treaty meant. One is binding, the other is indicative. If that is correct, the declaratory statement never could be ratified by the Senate. It does not possess the indicia of a treaty; it is an expression of individual opinion. We could approve it, we could say it represents what we believe, but we could not ratify it with the formalities with which a treaty under our Constitution must be ratified.

In other words, the Senator from Missouri assures the country that this declaratory statement, made at the time when the people demanded to know what was being done, was signed by the representatives of the four powers without affixing their seals; that they signed a document which they knew was merely indicative; a document which they knew was only an expression of their personal opinion; and the indignation of the country and the unrest of the country and the apprehension of the country were allayed.

I then asked both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Missouri—the Senator from Missouri left in the midst of the question and the Senator from Massachusetts did not deign to answer—whether or not, if the interpretation of the Senator from Missouri was correct, they deliberately sold this country a gold brick; whether they had led the people generally who are not acquainted with the devious ways of diplomacy and who do not understand that in the world of diplomacy language is made to conceal and not to express thought, an honest, unsuspecting people, conscious of no guile in themselves and suspecting none in others, to accept this declaration as a solemn assurance that the blood and treasure of this country would not be spilled or be spent in protecting these powder houses in the Orient, in protecting these seats of almost certain war. I asked whether they deliberately gave us a thing that looked like a treaty, but which was not a treaty; a thing that sounded like an assurance of protection, but was a mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbal, and whether they winked at one another when they passed this out to a gullable public.

If the contention of the Senator from Missouri is well founded, this proceeding borders upon duplicity. It is absolutely astounding and appalling to the people of this country. Again I ask whether or not the Senator from Missouri believes that they sold us a gold brick, and again I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to tell us why seals were omitted if they were material to the validity of the document?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The statement of the Senator from Missouri was made in the presence of the senior Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STANLEY. It was.

Mr. CARAWAY. The senior Senator from Massachusetts was a delegate to the conference and did not dissent, did he, from that statement?

Mr. STANLEY. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. And therefore I presume he assented to the statement of the Senator from Missouri that that was their intention.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Massachusetts did not deign any answer, and I usually speak very distinctly.

Mr. CARAWAY. He was present——

Mr. STANLEY. He is present now.

Mr. CARAWAY. And he did not contradict it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, may I say just a word apropos of the statement of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The declaratory statement says:

> In signing the treaty this day between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan it is declared to be the understanding and intent of the signatory powers—

So it was more than a mere declaration by the delegates as individuals; it was a declaration by the powers themselves, and raises this instrument to the dignity of a treaty as much so as the treaty which we ratified the other day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no question about that.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me further for just a moment, I do not mean to charge that the senior Senator from Alabama—and no more trained or seasoned statesman, no more exalted patriot ever adorned this body than he, and for the first time in many long years I have found it necessary to disagree with him, and it pains—I do believe that he and I do not wish to suspect that any other of the representatives of the United States would be party to such a thing. He has told us that at the time this thing was done he was called away from Washington by a sad bereavement in his family; that he was summoned to the death bed of his mother, and there he should have gone no matter what was pending. I do not believe he knew anything about it; I do not believe he could have been party to it; but the statement of the Senator from Missouri would indicate that, with their seals at hand, the delegates did not affix them; that these trained diplomats, knowing the meaning of a seal, deliberately abstained from giving the document the validity of a treaty when they knew the public must accept it as a treaty. If that be so, if they meant to give the people of this country an assurance which they knew they were not giving to the people of other countries, it is an appalling situation.

Such a charge by the Senator from Missouri, if true, impugns the integrity of the men who put up the job. I do not believe that the charge implied by the Senator from Missouri can be sustained, but I should like to know just why it was that this declaratory statement did not receive the same valid and formal approval as that which was given to the treaty itself. It was, as we know, signed first.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for his valuable contribution to the argument I was endeavoring to make.

I come back to the proposition, Mr. President—I merely wish to assert it, and then I shall leave it for the present—that what we have done is to ratify the treaty and leave out the supplement to the treaty, and the importance of the supplement to the United States can not be overestimated. In fact, I am quite sure that if it had been understood and declared at the time we were ratifying this treaty that it should include domestic questions such as immigration and the tariff it never could have been ratified by this Chamber.

Mr. President, I know that some contention was made by Senators, and that contention supports the theory I have been advancing, that no domestic questions affecting the United States could arise out of this treaty, because it was a treaty which dealt with the rights of the contracting parties in the Pacific and certain regions of the Pacific. In my judgment, there is no force in that argument. Undoubtedly, we have rights with reference to Japanese immigration in the Philippines and in Guam and in Hawaii, and these rights with reference to the immigration of Japanese to these island possessions of the United States might have arisen in a form that would have involved Japan and the United States in serious difficulties; but that is a phase of the matter that I did not rise to discuss.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	McNary	Spencer
Borah	Frelinghuysen	Moses	Stanley
Broussard	Gerry	New	Sterling
Bursum	Glass	Oddie	Townsend
Calder	Gooding	Overman	Trammell
Cameron	Hale	Page	Underwood
Capper	Harris	Phipps	Wadsworth
Caraway	Harrison	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Colt	Johnson	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Warren
Curtis	Kellogg	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
Dial	Keyes	Robinson	Weller
Edge	La Follette	Sheppard	Williams
Ernst	Lenroot	Shields	Willis.
Fernald	Lodge	Shortridge
Fletcher	McCormick	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate in the way I have because, in the first instance, I thought we should have a definite understanding as to whether it was the contention of the State Department and of the Senators who are responsible for piloting this treaty through the Senate that the ratification of the treaty was a ratification of this supplementary declaration. We have now, I think, about reached an understanding as to that. It is now understood and not disputed, as I take it, that in ratifying the treaty we did not ratify these declarations. Now the very serious question arises, What is to become of those declarations? Is there to be any supplemental action with respect to them or are they to be permitted to stand upon their own bases? If there is to be no supplemental action with regard to them, then I wish to discuss what, in that situation, would be the legal and technical effect of these declarations.

Before I discuss that, however, I want to inquire of some Senator on the other side as to one matter. I do not see anyone here from the Foreign Relations Committee except the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] probably may feel authorized to speak. I want to inquire, if there is any Senator on the other side who can answer me or will answer me, as to whether or not any further action in the Senate upon these supplemental declarations is contemplated?

Mr. NEW. I do not think any further action was contemplated.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no intention, then, of presenting these declarations as a treaty or of seeking to have the questions involved in those declarations reduced to the form of a treaty?

Mr. NEW. I think not.

Mr. SIMMONS. What effect, then, does the Senator from Indiana contend, or does any Senator on the other side contend, that these declarations have or will have?

Mr. NEW. I think they were not to be a part of the treaty at all, and no formal action of the Senate was contemplated with reference to them. I know of no change in the intent of the committee. The matter of further action has not been presented to or considered by the committee, so far as I know.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator, then, contend that these declarations are an interpretation of the treaty by the makers of the treaty, and, being an interpretation made contemporaneously with the making of the treaty, would be authoritative and accepted by the parties to that treaty?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the contention?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. And upon that contention the Senator's party proposes to rest this whole question, involving these fundamental rights of the American people?

Mr. NEW. I see no reason why it should not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like a little information about this matter, though possibly the matter has been the subject of consideration heretofore. Can the Senator from Indiana advise us whether, as in the case of the United States, these treaties must be ratified by some branch of the Japanese Government before they become effective?

Mr. NEW. I think not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So far as Japan is concerned, she is now bound?

Mr. NEW. I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, no nation can be bound by a treaty until there has been an exchange of ratifications, no matter whether advice and consent to a treaty by a parliamentary body is required or not. I think the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Indiana will agree that the universal, established rule of international law is that a treaty does not take effect until the final act in the consummation of the treaty has been accomplished, and that is the exchange of ratifications.

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The four-power treaty would go into effect, if my memory serves me correctly, by the executive act of the exchange of ratifications and without procedure by a branch of the legislative department.

Mr. NEW. The legislative department of the Japanese Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am speaking of the Japanese Government. It could not go into effect, however, until the exchange of ratifications, which is a purely executive function, has been performed. If we want to give to the four-power treaty the construction which this declaration implies, we must put the declaration in the four-power treaty for this reason, that Japan could exchange the ratifications as to the four-power treaty, and thus put that instrument into effect, since the United States has already advised and consented to it, and it is assumed that our President will exchange ratifications; but if we ratify separately a declaration in the nature of a reservation or explanation of what the four-power treaty means, then Japan will be given the option of refusing to exchange the ratifications as to that instrument, and thus we might be in the anomalous position of having agreed to the four-power treaty which was intended to have the construction placed upon it by these declarations. But for a mysterious and absolutely inexplicable reason, a reason, if any exists, which no one connected with the treaty has attempted to explain, the declaration was not incorporated in the four-power treaty, and the same would be true if the declaration were attached as a reservation to the pending supplementary treaty. Japan could refuse to exchange the ratifications as to that treaty, and we would not have an authentic construction of the four-power treaty as excluding domestic questions.

It may be recalled that in the very first address I delivered to the Senate touching this treaty I inquired then of the negotiators of it expressly to know why this declaration had not been incorporated in the four-power treaty, and the only answer that was given, as I remember it, was that made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], he stating that the declaration was the creation of Mr. Hughes, who had deemed it best to proceed in that manner. No answer was given to the inquiry, in my judgment. The vice of this situation is that unless there is a reconsideration by the Senate of the vote by which the Senate advised and consented to the ratification of the four-power treaty, no matter what action the Senate takes now as to this explanatory declaration, no matter if we do advise and consent to it, Japan will then have the option of refusing at the same time to ratify the four-power treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thank the Senator. That was the information I was desirous of eliciting. I wanted to know in what situation we would be if we should ratify now the declaratory statements signed contemporaneously with the main treaty and Japan should refuse either to ratify them, if so required by her constitution, or refuse to exchange ratifications, so far as the declaratory statement is concerned, exchanging ratifications as to what might be spoken of as the "main treaty." In that case I take it that the main treaty would be in force and effect, while the declaratory statements would fall by the wayside.

I take it that the American people want the thing either to go through as a whole or to fail as a whole, and do not care to bind themselves by the main treaty unless the declaratory statements go with it; but if we ratify this, I feel that we may lose altogether the effect of that, and I wanted to inquire whether that view is taken by those who are favoring this method of disposing of the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what the Senator from Montana said in regard to the declaration is of course quite true. It has no ratifying article; there is no provision for ratification in it. It can be ratified, however, I have no doubt. If it were brought before the Senate, I have no doubt it could be ratified as the Rush-Bagot note was ratified. As many Senators have expressed doubt about it and have said that it ought to have received some formal ratification, it seems to me the best way would be to add the language of the declaration at the end of the ratifying resolution of the supplementary treaty which is now before us, which relates to the same subject and which reads:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive O, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, an agreement between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions, and defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan, signed at Washington February 6, 1922.

Then add:

Subject to the following reservations and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification:

1. That the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean—

And so forth.

And then put in the whole declaration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not quite understand the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. My suggestion is that we may insert as a part of the resolution of ratification of the supplementary treaty the whole declaration which has been the subject of controversy here for the last few days.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts I had made the inquiry of any member of the Foreign Relations Committee on the other side as to whether it was the intention on the other side of the Chamber to propose any additional action with reference to questions included in this declaration, and I was told that that was not the intention.

Mr. LODGE. I did not happen to speak with the Senator from Indiana about it, and I have had no meeting of the committee.

Mr. NEW. That is what I said. I said that so far as I knew the matter had not been referred to the committee and had not been up for discussion by the committee, and that I did not know any further action was contemplated.

Mr. LODGE. I stated on Saturday, when the Senator from North Carolina probably was not here, what I had not had an opportunity to say on Friday, when we were voting, that I had no objection to ratifying the declaration if the Senate desired to do it, although it seemed to me unnecessary. It has seemed to me on further consideration, and after discussion with some Senators with whom I talked, that the best way is to make it a reservation to the pending treaty, as it relates to the same subject, which, of course, would give it treaty standing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was about to make an argument to the effect that it could not be effective as an interpretation, and that it was necessary, if the things which are provided for are to be safeguarded, or to become operative as an agreement between this country and the other parties to this pact, to take some affirmative action looking toward bringing about that result. The Senator from Indiana, I understood, indicated that he thought it would be treated by the other side merely as an interpretative agreement.

Mr. LODGE. That is all it was.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to make the argument with that in view, and I believe I will proceed with it, although I am very much gratified to hear the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator does not want to take this means of doing it, of course I am perfectly willing to let the whole thing stand as it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was about to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have not had time, of course, to fully examine what he has prepared.

Mr. LODGE. It is nothing in the world but the declaration which the Senator has had before him for weeks.

Mr. SIMMONS. If that effectively safeguards the rights of the United States to control domestic questions, the main objection that I have to leaving the matter rest without any further action, lying altogether upon the force or effect that that may possibly have as an interpretative resolution, would be overcome.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator think the declarations did cover those questions?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the declarations covered the questions, but I think the declarations, unless they are ratified as a part of the treaty or a supplement to it or as an independent treaty, will be inoperative, because the agreement is not an interpretation. The agreement is an understanding.

Mr. LODGE. Surely it is. That is the word used.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an understanding which changes or which adds to or subtracts from the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. This makes it a part of the treaty, and it must be ratified.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator now tells me he proposes to offer it?

Mr. LODGE. I mean to offer it. I have not consulted the committee. I shall do it on my own responsibility, but that is the form—

Subject to the following reservations and understanding, which is hereby made a part of this resolution of ratification—

And then fill in all that the declaration contains.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was absent from the city at the time the report was made, but I have been informed that the committee has already reported the declaration as a part of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. It was read in the committee and reported.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mean when the treaty itself was reported.

Mr. LODGE. It was all reported in Senate Executive N.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement which the Senator from Massachusetts just read?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; not that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am referring to the declaration.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the declaratory statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no occasion for a meeting of the committee and an additional report.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not quite understand the course the Senator from Massachusetts proposes. We have already ratified the four-power pact.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the ratifications are exchanged between the Government of the United States and the Government of Japan, the four-power pact is in force and effect. How can anything that we add to this supplementary agreement in the nature of a reservation affect that in any wise?

Mr. LODGE. It gives it the binding force of a treaty, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To be sure, provided Japan will exchange ratifications with us with respect to this supplementary agreement.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, any of the signers have the right to refuse ratification, just as we have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us assume, for instance, that Japan refuses to exchange ratifications with respect to the supplementary agreement, whether there is a reservation attached to it or whether there is not.

Mr. LODGE. That is, she has changed her mind and wants Japan proper included in the treaty?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Whatever reason she may have, she may balance that against subdivision 2.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, any treaty may be rejected, and that nobody can cover.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator will follow me. That gives Japan an opportunity to reject the supplementary agreement——

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly. That she has now.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. While we are still bound by what might be spoken of as the main treaty. Both parties are bound by that when the ratifications are exchanged. So this declaration, intended to limit and restrict or, at least, define the terms of the main treaty, will have fallen and the main treaty would go into effect unrestricted and undefined as contemplated in the supplementary agreement.

Mr. LODGE. I see no other way to deal with it. The Senate can vote it down if it chooses.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, we must take chances upon Japan exchanging the ratifications.

Mr. LODGE. We have to take chances on a failure to ratify by the other powers. I do not believe for one moment that Japan or any other power would think of objecting to a reservation which they had all signed already.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, but we have done it. We did not hesitate——

Mr. LODGE. I think they have some common sense and some good faith. I do not think we are the only people in the world who have good faith and common sense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We did not hesitate to reject the Versailles treaty, although our representatives had solemnly signed and entered into it.

Mr. LODGE. That is true. That was the whole treaty. I do not say all of these treaties may not be rejected by the other powers. I am not responsible for them. I offer it in this way to meet objections which I do not have, but which other Senators have expressed to me in such way that the treaty will have to be rejected unless what they have all signed is formally accepted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If these two documents were treated as one and the same instrument, Japan would not then be in the situation where she could accept in part and reject in part. She would be obliged to reject the whole thing—that is, the two combined instruments—or to accept the two combined instruments. Now she will be at liberty to accept the main treaty if that is satisfactory to her and to reject the supplementary treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly, and if the Senator thinks that is a good reason to reject this, he can do it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think it is a very good reason to reject it. That is not the point. The point is, can we not now arrange the thing in such way by treating the two as one and the same instrument and document, according to well-established rules of law, so that she will have no opportunity to accept the one and reject the other?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, why can not the Senate ascertain now the reason for the course pursued by the negotiators of these treaties in confusing their procedure so that it becomes difficult to determine what will be the actual effect of advising and consenting to the four-power treaty?

In the first place, I have been trying to find out from the beginning of the debate why, when the negotiators decided to change their policy and exclude, rather than include, the mainland of Japan from the operation of the four-power treaty, they did not rewrite the treaty and thus escape the anomalous situation which may arise in connection with the two treaties, the four-power treaty and the supplementary treaty. The Senate has advised and consented to the first. In all probability it will advise and consent to the supplementary treaty in some form. Japan may for any reason sufficient in the opinion of her authorities exchange ratifications as to the four-power treaty and thus put that instrument into effect, and refuse to exchange ratifications as to the supplementary treaty. Then what will result? The mainland of Japan will be embraced within the terms of the four-power treaty. The construction which the signers of the four-power treaty sought by supplementary treaty to place upon the original treaty will fail both as to the exclusion of the Japanese mainland and as to the reservation of domestic questions from consideration by the conferences which may be called under the treaty.

There must be some reason why the conference pursued the course which was taken. The natural and logical course to pursue was to write one treaty and to place within its terms such interpretation and such exclusion, both as to territory and as to controversies, as the conference desired to embrace and to exclude. It can not be said that the reason why this course was not pursued was that the conference did not care to make a new draft of the treaty, for the reason that it was disclosed during the course of the debate that 20 or 30 or 40 drafts were in fact prepared. The natural course for two lawyers writing a contract is to redraft their contract so as to make it express the meeting of their minds and particularly is that the course usually taken where the contract is brief and its provisions are definite.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, it seems to me the purpose was the natural effect of the action. As the Senator has indicated in his remarks, it leaves all these matters to be determined not by us but by Japan. Under the effect of having the separate treaties, it is for Japan to determine whether or not she desires her mainland to be included, and not for us to determine. We have ratified a treaty which includes her mainland. We have a supplementary treaty which excludes it. If Japan desires to include her mainland, all she has to do, as was indicated by the Senator from Arkansas, is to reject the supplementary treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Ratify the four-power treaty and reject the supplementary treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes. Now, the question is left for Japan to determine whether domestic questions shall be considered by the four powers in conference. We ratify the four-power treaty that leaves that doubtful. Then we have a declaratory supplement which excludes immigration and domestic questions. We ratify that. Japan having obtained the four-power treaty without action ratifying the declaratory statement, the question is still left open for her to determine whether a conference emanating from the four-power treaty shall consider domestic questions or not.

It seems to me the effect of the situation is to leave every question for its ultimate determination to the council in Japan. As I understand, none of these treaties will go into effect until the council of Japan shall ratify them as our Senate has ratified them. The effect of this procedure is to leave the ultimate decision of these intricate questions to Japan and not to us.

Mr. ROBINSON. Whether or not the Japanese council, under the procedure which prevails in Japan, must consent to these treaties in order to give them validity, it is unquestionably true, as I pointed out a moment ago, that neither treaty can take effect until the exchange of ratifications has occurred; and by the simple failure to perform the executive function of exchanging the ratifications as to any one of the treaties, or either one of them, Japan can prevent that treaty from going into effect if she chooses to do so.

Now, I repeat, with the subject matter still before the conference, the negotiators still in conference, in daily contact with one another, why did they pursue the extraordinary course of preparing what appears now to amount to three separate treaties relating to one subject matter? They wrote a treaty including the Japanese mainland in its provisions, and no one has been able to understand why the Japanese mainland was included. Another treaty excluding the Japanese mainland was reported and a third agreement in the form of a declaration was submitted.

Is there any Senator here who can tell us now, after all the debate and all the inquiries which have occurred, why the Japanese mainland was included in the four-power treaty?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course, I can not tell the Senator, and yet the Senator's argument has eliminated every other cause except one, and that is that the negotiators of the treaty were not certain what their Governments would do, and they deliberately placed the treaty in such a form that the Governments might accept one and refuse the other. I think we are justified in saying that the action of the negotiators in placing them in separate treaties, the action of the proponents of the treaty and those having charge of the matter in the Senate, in deliberately submerging that portion of the four-power pact which is called a declaration, which excluded our domestic relations, and their subsequent refusal to adopt a reservation in the exact words prepared by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as a reservation to the covenant of the League of Nations, taken in connection with the statements of the British ambassador in California—no matter what those statements were exactly—justifies the suspicion that the four powers, knowing that the only threat of war on the Pacific was as to the management of our domestic affairs, intended to have these treaties so arranged that those domestic affairs could be submitted to the conferences of the four powers.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senate had understood when it advised and consented to the ratification of the four-power treaty that in all probability it was leaving to the conference which might be called under the provisions of that treaty the power to determine domestic questions, including immigration, the Senators who voted to advise and consent to the ratification of that treaty never would have dared to do so. The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who delivered an address in this body several days ago, and who, I believe, for some reason, has not yet published his address, would not dare to vote for a treaty giving a conference composed of representatives of Japan, Great Britain, France, and the United States the right to determine the question as to whether Japanese citizens should be admitted to citizenship in the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. It must be remembered, Mr. President, that a great many statesmen in the eastern section of the United States have not looked upon the Japanese question as have we of the West, who are familiar with it. It must be remembered that the Republican administration has time and again taken steps as a Federal Government to interfere with the Legislature of the State of California in connection with the enactment of laws within its jurisdiction prejudicial to the Japanese subjects in this country. It must also be remembered that it has been the outspoken policy of the Republican Party under several administrations to hold that treaties with Japan should be superior to the laws of the Western States with regard to the Japanese controversial questions in this country. The object, it is said, of this four-power pact is to eliminate the causes which threaten war between the United States and Japan. Its framers know that there are no causes which threaten war between the United States and Japan except the controverted domestic question in the United States with regard to Japanese subjects; but there is not any doubt on earth there are statesmen in this country who are now seeking to stop those threats of war by preventing the States of this Union from legislating in a discriminatory manner against Japanese subjects.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I interrupt the Senator to ask a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is not any doubt that Great Britain and France, who are partially responsible to Japan in the event war shall ever arise in the Pacific, are more interested in preventing such a war than they are in sustaining the right of this country to manage its own domestic affairs. There is not any doubt that Great Britain and France would like to-day to submit to a conference of the four powers the question as to whether or not Japanese subjects shall be given equal rights in this country with British and French subjects. The way in which the four-power pact was ratified justifies, I say, in the mind of anyone the suspicion that there was in the minds of the framers of the separate pacts the intention to bring about a situation that would allow the conference to settle causes of dispute which involve our domestic affairs instead of allowing us to settle them ourselves.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to ask if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] did not intend to include Democratic as well as Republican administrations in his allusion to Federal interference to prevent State legislation? I had in mind, if my memory serves me aright, the visit of Secretary of State Bryan to California when he sought to delay or to prevent the enactment of the alien land act by the California Legislature.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Illinois is right. I thank him for reminding me of that. I did not intend to be unjust. I was thinking more particularly of the action of President Roosevelt when he was President. It is true, however, as the Senator from Illinois has stated, that the Democratic administration, through its Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, did, as I am informed and believe, attempt to exert official influence upon the Legislature of the State of California.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Nevada will recall that the Secretary of State himself proceeded to California to discuss the matter with members of the legislature.

Mr. PITTMAN. I believe that is correct; and it sustains exactly what I have said, that there are a great many statesmen in this country of both political parties who are willing to sacrifice the rights of the States to decide their internal domestic questions in order that they may be submitted to a conference or controlled by Federal legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, nothing that has occurred either during any Republican administration or during any Democratic administration justifies Senators in the conclusion that the people of this country are willing to permit unrestricted Japanese immigration into the United States. It will be remembered that when Mr. Bryan went before the California Legislature upon the mission to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] has referred his position was overwhelmingly overridden; and the position of Mr. Roosevelt's administration respecting the subject was equally unpopular in California, in Washington, in Oregon, and in other States where the real substance of the issue was comprehended.

During the course of this debate frequent reference has been made to the fact that the British ambassador has gone to California and made speeches in an effort to popularize there the four-power treaty. While the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in the exercise of his constitutional duty was trying to see that the four-power treaty was put into terms that would protect the people of California against the dangers incident to Japanese immigration and land ownership, for some reason the British ambassador and the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, were making forensic attacks in his rear. When the people of California come to understand that Japan is now to be given the option of deciding the two great questions involved in this treaty, first, whether her mainland shall have the protection of the four flags instead of one, and, second, whether she shall be given the privilege of determining whether domestic controversies shall be the subject matter of consideration before the conferences of the four powers to be convened under the treaty, the people of California will not be lacking in appreciation of the splendid courage displayed by the senior Senator from California. I believe in the utmost freedom of expression. If the British ambassador wants to engage in debate touching the political policies of the United States, I have no objection whatever to his doing so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the Senator will remember, however, that one British ambassador was recalled from this country for expressing an opinion on political questions then pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. I recall the instance which the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. I had hoped that no administration would feel called upon nor at liberty to call in foreign diplomats to coerce public opinion in America to accept a treaty which had been negotiated.

Mr. ROBINSON. I stated that I had no objection to the utmost freedom of debate, because I do not believe when the British Government adopts the policy of trying to influence and control public opinion in the United States through its chosen and authorized spokesman that it can accomplish the end which it seeks to accomplish.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will my colleague yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON. With pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think I understood the Senator's position, and I agree with him; but it is very likely that the British delegates to the conference wrote the treaty, and therefore best understood it and appreciated what was in it. Under that theory, I presume, they would have the right to defend it at the bar of public opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was a very unusual procedure, to say the least, that while the Senate of the United States was engaged in the performance of its constitutional function, and while one of the Senators from California was boldly and bravely championing and defending what he believed to be the best interests of his people, the British ambassador to the United States and a member of the Cabinet of the present administration should dash across the continent and engage in public discussion for the purpose of influencing public sentiment in California respecting this important question.

To return to the proposition of a moment ago, I said that we can not learn the reason for the peculiar course taken by the negotiators of the treaty. Lawyers writing a contract do not pursue the course which they followed. Some reason exists for it. We have now the anomalous situation that the United States has ratified the four-power treaty with the Japanese mainland included in the treaty and with domestic questions comprehended by the terms of the treaty. I know it may be answered that domestic questions are not comprehended, but the failure of the Senate to adopt the explanatory declaration which reserved domestic questions from the treaty would be construed in courts everywhere as a conclusion upon the part of the Senate that the reservation was undesirable, or that it was unnecessary.

The negotiators of the treaty thought this declaration of so much importance that before they wrote the treaty itself they wrote the declaration explaining the treaty. That is the undisputed evidence. Why did they do it? Because they knew it needed explanation. They knew in advance of signing the four-power treaty what was going into that treaty. They knew it would require explanation, and they were unwilling to put the explanation in the treaty itself. Why?

The day we advised and consented to the ratification of the treaty, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] insisted that this declaration ought to be acted upon by the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was so impatient that he would not discuss the matter with the Senator from Nebraska. He said it was absurd, that it was no part of the treaty; that it had no place in the treaty; that it could not be ratified by the Senate; but now, for some reason, he has changed his front. That is nothing remarkable in the course of the Senator from Massachusetts. If he did not change a few times on every subject that we consider, Senators would doubt whether his mental processes retained their usual characteristics. The Senator from Massachusetts tells us now that this declaration shall be incorporated in the supplemental treaty, as a reservation to the supplemental treaty. You have heard from the beginning the talk about the four-power treaty as the simplest thing on earth; that there are only a few hundred words in it; that it is so plain and so easily understood that nobody could misinterpret it; and yet the very men who wrote it started out by explaining it in advance of signing it. They wrote this declaration qualifying the treaty changing it, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in two important particulars. They adopted the reservation of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and then they proposed a supplemental treaty in explanation of it.

Why all of this mystery, and why all this complication? Why did they not put in the four-power treaty what they desired it should contain and submit to the Governments interested all the questions at one time? Why give Japan, by ratifying the four-power treaty, the privilege of rejecting the supplemental treaty? Why give her the option in that way to say whether the Japanese mainland shall be included in the provisions of the four-power treaty? Why leave in doubt the one question that has caused more trouble between Japan and the United States than any other question? If you are going to try to work it out, well and good; but do not think that the people can be deceived or led into the thought that you have accomplished something when you refuse even to attempt to solve the real cause for disputes.

We all know—I have said so repeatedly during the debate—that the questions of race equality, land ownership in California, and the right of Japanese to come into the United States are the domestic problems about which all of our disputes with Japan have arisen.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to another matter that may become very acute?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is the attempt to declare that trade with the Philippine Islands is coastwise. There is in the new marine bill that is now pending, to subsidize the merchant marine, a provision declaring trade with the Philippine Islands to be coastwise trade.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] made a statement the other night, the significance of which I think the Senate failed to get. Japan now has under her mandate islands in the Pacific Ocean which, if embraced in what may be termed a block mandate, would control the lines of commerce from the coast of the United States to the Orient. Already Japan has declared closed, as Japanese waters, the waters of the Pacific Ocean adjacent to certain islands which she owns, and already there seems in formation a policy of creating what may be termed block mandates—that is, of embracing within a single area, as closed waters, the territory of the countless islands which constitute the mandate, and the sea surrounding the islands, and when that is done no ship flying a flag other than that of Japan can pass through the ordinary channels of commerce across the Pacific Ocean except by consent of Japan.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has graphically described these immense vast tracts of ocean that are blocked out as being under a Japanese mandate, and Japan may assert and probably does assert that no ships, except by her permission, may go in there; and the island of Yap is in one of those blocks.

Mr. ROBINSON. We all understand that under international law waters within 3 miles of the shore line of territory belonging to any nation are included within that territory, and these islands lie so close together and are so numerous that by the extension of that principle a vast area of the Pacific Ocean in the neighborhood of these islands might be claimed to constitute Japanese waters, to the exclusion of the ships of commerce of every other nation, if Japan chose to assert and to attempt to maintain such a principle.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the peculiar situation now is that if she asserts it we guarantee that she shall maintain it and that we will respect it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. We have committed ourselves, by the ratification of the four-power treaty, to Japanese control of the Pacific. We have committed ourselves, by the ratification of the four-power treaty, to a policy of acquiescence in Japan's plan of expansion, which contemplates the maintenance of her possession of territory already seized in violation of law and right, and the extension of her authority by economic penetration supported by military power into other areas which, from considerations of economic necessity, she thinks she is entitled to possess. Nothing else can result from the four-power treaty but the supremacy of Japan in the Pacific Ocean and in the Orient, as we term it.

The immediate question before the Senate is the amendment to the supplementary treaty, proposed by myself, striking from the treaty the following:

Karafuto (or the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin).

Every reason that justifies or makes necessary the exclusion of the Japanese mainland from the four-power treaty applies with equal, if not with greater, force to the island of Sakhalin.

We have never learned why the mainland of Japan was at first included in the treaty, why it is in there now. We have never learned of any substantial reason for a reversal of the policy of embracing it if once you take the policy of inclusion to have been considered in the beginning. But if it be that the Japanese mainland constitutes the center of Empire, and therefore the objective for naval or military attack, then I reply that the principle applies with more force to Karafuto.

Karafuto at its nearest point is within 4 miles of the Asiatic mainland. The northern portion is nominally under the government of Russia. The southern portion is claimed by Japan. Some time ago, upon the theory—I will not say the pretense—that it was necessary to pursue that course in order to preserve order. Japan seized control of the northern portion of the island of Sakhalin, and she is now in complete authority throughout the island. When the day dawns that Russia decides to drive Japan out of her dominions; when the time comes—and it is coming in the not remote future—when the armies of Russia advance to the defense of Russia's territory against an alien race, Karafuto, by all the laws of strategy, will become the first point of attack, for a conflict is certain to arise over who shall exercise sovereignty on the northern half.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that the whole matter is unimportant, because Russia can not strike within 10 years, and at the end of 10 years we may be able to get out of the treaty. That would seem to be an admission that if Russia were in a normal condition this would be an improvident and unwise arrangement in so far as the United States is concerned.

Karafuto is the scene of great Japanese activity. The Japanese have almost destroyed or driven out the native population. The Japanese are increasing in numbers there, as they do in every other territory which they enter, more rapidly than any other race increases.

The Japanese are establishing a civilization on the island of Sakhalin which in many respects is worthy of admiration, but Sakhalin, from a strategic standpoint, is vital to Japanese interests. Before the Japanese mainland can be reached Russia must overcome, in all probability, the Japanese possession of Sakhalin. We were told that it is not important whether the Japanese mainland is in the treaty or out of it, on the theory that the treaty is a mere arrangement for a conference; and yet, for some reason, we are taking the mainland out of the treaty. We are not taking it out; we are leaving it to Japan to determine, in the procedure which we are actually taking, whether it shall be in or out.

International arrangements among great powers—alliances, if you please—can not be justified on the ground that others whose interests may be detrimentally affected by the alliances will be powerless to assert their rights during the continuance of the alliances. The traditional policy of the United States throughout history has been to respect and safeguard the rights of weaker nations. By this four-power treaty we have now gone into an arrangement with Great Britain, France, and Japan by which we propose to remain inactive and nonprotesting while Japan works out her policy, whatever it may be, respecting the Asiatic mainland. In this treaty we have put Karafuto strategically between the Japanese mainland and the Asiatic mainland. We have said by the treaty that whenever Japanese rights in that island are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power we will respond to the call of Japan to advise her as to the most efficient measures to be taken, either jointly or separately.

You can not look into the future and determine when Japan will be called upon to defend her possession of Sakhalin against Russian attack, and if Russia ever does attempt to throw off the Japanese yoke, that will be her natural first point of attack. Unless we are going to commit ourselves to the policy of maintaining the integrity and the safety of the Japanese Empire, what is the use of assuming responsibility to confer with Japan to the exclusion of Russia, when Russia seeks to reestablish herself?

In Russia there are 180,000,000 people of the Caucasian blood. For the first time in history that I recall, the Caucasian race in parts of Russia is held in subjection by representatives of the yellow race. Japan will not recede; Russia must attempt to drive her back, and when she does so the Japanese insular possessions and insular dominions, which comprehend Karafuto, will be threatened, and we will be called upon then to say whether we will keep the faith expressed when we entered into the four-power treaty, namely, that when Japanese rights are threatened by aggressive action we will advise Japan how she can best repel that action. If you want to take the mainland out, take out also this island, which is more likely to cause trouble than even the main islands themselves.

Mr. President, in response to engagements made some six or eight weeks ago, I shall be compelled to leave the city tomorrow for some days. If it meets with the wishes of the Senate, I would like to have a vote upon this amendment before I leave. I have no disposition whatever to insist upon precipitate action, and if Senators desire to discuss the subject matter of the amendment they are, of course, at liberty to do so at such length as may seem to them fruitful of benefit to the country and of information to the Senate.

We had little information respecting the island involved in this amendment when the treaty was brought to the Senate; we have scarcely more now. But the British Government had information. The British Government made a study of the subject of Sakhalin in preparation for the Paris conference, and that Government reached the conclusion, in my judgment, according to the little volume which I hold in my hand, that Sakhalin should go to Japan. I have not the slightest doubt that the practical result of the existing conditions, supplemented by the arrangements in this treaty, will be to give Sakhalin as a whole to Japan, although she now actually claims to own only the southern portion. However that may be, considering the proximity of the island to the Asiatic mainland, considering the fact that it must constitute a point of attack should Russia ever strike back at Japan, I believe that wise policy justifies the Senate in putting Sakhalin in the same class in which we are seeking to put the Japanese main islands, and exclude the main islands and Karafuto from the treaty.

I shall ask leave to insert in the RECORD the information to which I have referred respecting Sakhalin. This is a British publication, the only recent publication I have been able to obtain relating to that island, setting forth in somewhat satisfactory details the facts as they relate to the inclusion of this island in the treaty.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not intend his amendment to be a declaration, as far as he or the Senate is concerned, that Japan's title to the southern half of Sakhalin is at all questioned or not admitted; that is to say, we express no opinion one way of the other upon its title?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am seeking to strike that out of the treaty. The inclusion of that in the treaty might be held to involve a question of the title, but striking it from the treaty would certainly not strengthen any title or claim that Japan has.

Mr. KING. It would put it in the same position with the mainland. We express no opinion, by the Senator's amendment, as to the Japanese title to the mainland or Japan's title to the southern half of Sakhalin?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senator holds to this view, that because of the propinquity of Sakhalin to the mainland of Asia, and not because of its propinquity to the mainland, so called, of Japan—"nearness," if the Senator prefers? I want to get the distincttion in the Senator's mind. Is it because Karafuto is nearer the Asiatic mainland?

Mr. ROBINSON. That is a part of the reason I have given. I have pointed out the fact that there is a conflict of authority as to Karafuto which must inevitably result in a clash between Japan and Russia, or that Russian authority and Russian citizens must disappear forever from the northern half of the island. Japan is dominating the whole of the island. She is committing acts of oppression toward members of the native population and representatives of the Russian Government, and in consequence of this course of oppression, if for no other reason, Russia would be likely to strike there, and strike there first.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was called from the Chamber. Has the Senator urged the same action with regard to Hongkong, because of its relation to Kau-lung?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not gone into that subject at all. I have confined my suggestions touching amendments to the amendment pending before the Senate, the one which I offered myslf, which proposes to strike from the treaty Karafuto, or the southern portion of Sakhalin. I do not care at this time to propose other amendments, or to enter into a discussion of other subjects.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator has no view which he cares to express on the subject of Hongkong or Kau-lung?

Mr. ROBINSON. Or Singapore, either.

Mr. McCORMICK. There is a distinction, if I may say so.

Mr. ROBINSON. There are some distinctions. There is no question about it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Hongkong, lying off Kau-lung, is liable to attack by the Chinese, precisely as Sakhalin might be attacked from the mainland of Asia.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there is much force in the suggestion just made by the Senator from Illinois. If China ever recovers her national integrity, if she ever wakes up, if she ever becomes inspired with the ambition which characterizes the Japanese race at the present time, China will do what I expect Russia to do, namely, strike back at her oppressor; and if that should be brought about by any policy which may be inaugurated, and China, with her 400,000,000 people, should join Russia, with her 180,000,000, the United States would be facing a problem as difficult of solution as any which ever arose.

The fact is Caucasian civilization would be threatened, and we know it and assert it. There is nothing more pitiable in human history than the manner in which China has been outraged by her friends.

Mr. McCORMICK. I am only astonished that the Senator did not prepare amendments dealing with Hongkong at the same time he prepared one dealing with Sakhalin.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will propose an amendment dealing with Hongkong, I will be delighted to support it. I take it from the Senator's suggestion that he realizes that in addition to the injustice of including in this treaty Karafuto there is also an injustice in including Hongkong. If he will propose an amendment excluding the port of Hongkong, I will be glad to support it.

I ask leave to print in the RECORD, in 8-point type, the information to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

I. GEOGRAPHY—PHYSICAL AND POLITICAL.

(1) POSITION AND BOUNDARIES.

The island of Sakhalin, which lies between 45° 54′ and 54° 27′ north latitude and between 141° 49′ and 144° 45′ east longitude, is separated on the northwest from the mainland of Asia by the Strait of Tartary, and on the south from the island of Yezo by the Strait of La Pérouse, which connects the Sea of Japan and the Gulf of Tartary on the south and west with the Okhotsk Sea on the east. The distance across the Strait of Tartary from Cape Pogobi, on Sakhalin, to Cape Lazarev, on the mainland, is only about 4 miles. The island is 586 miles long from north to south and varies in width from 12 to 95 miles. It has an area of about 29,000 square miles, including adjacent islands. By the treaty of Portsmouth in 1905 the island was divided at 50° north latitude, the northern part being assigned to Russia and the southern to Japan. The Japanese portion, which is known as Karafuto, has an area of 13,148 square miles, while the Russian portion is supposed to be somewhat larger.

(2) SURFACE, COAST, AND RIVER SYSTEM.

Surface.

Sakhalin has been very imperfectly surveyed, but probably local tradition is right in regarding it as having once been a peninsula, as it is now parted from the mainland only by a narrow and shallow strait. The arrangement of the mountains generally adopted presumes that there are three ranges—a north-central range starting in the Schmidt Peninsula, a western range along the coast of the Gulf of Tartary, and an eastern range along the Sea of Okhotsk. Geographers attribute the chief heights to the western range in Japanese territory, the principal being Lopatinski or Berzinet Peak, 3,890 feet, and Toman Dake, 3,396 feet; in the eastern range the highest point appears to be Mount Tiara, 1,940 feet.

The principal stretches of level land on the island are on the western side from about 51° 20′ to 53° 50′ north latitude, and on the eastern side from about 51° 40′ to the same degree. Both these plains are covered in parts with scanty vegetation. Across the island stretches a long plain, which extends from the northern shore of the Gulf of Patience (Terpyeniya) up the valley of the Poronai and down the valley of the Tim. The watershed between these rivers is about 1,900 feet in altitude.

Coast.

The western coast of Sakhalin is wooded and consists chiefly of high bluffs, partly of granite, partly of sand, rising in places to a height of 400 feet. North of the Strait of Mamia Rinzo, however, the coast is very low, being scarcely visible from a ship following the usual route.

The eastern coast from Manue to Cape Dalrymple is steep and rocky, and south of Cape Löwenstein becomes high and mountainous. From there to Cape Elizabeth the coast is iron-bound.

In the Japanese part of the island lie Aniva Bay, in the southern extremity, and the wide Gulf of Patience (Terpyeniya), both of which are fishing centers. Characteristic features of this coast are the sea lakes or bays which are formed along both shores. Bars are formed rapidly at the mouths of the rivers, but being of porous and friable material are quickly and easily intersected by the sea.

River system.

The two chief rivers are the Tim and Poronai. Each has a course of about 300 miles, and they flow respectively north and south from about latitude 50° 30′ north, being separated by the Palrov Pass. The chief tributaries of the Tim are the Pulruga on the right bank and the Malo-Tim and the important river Nis on the left. This river flows into the Bay of Ni, which is protected from the sea by a spit of sand with a narrow aperture (the Anuchina opening). The Poronai is a very similar stream. It rises near the source of the Tim, makes a bend northward, and then turns south, in which direction it flows for the rest of its course.

At the extreme south of the island are the rivers Niabuchi and Susuzha, the former of which has a depth of 20 feet for the last 10 miles of its course.

(3) CLIMATE.

The whole island is much colder than might be anticipated from its latitude, and the climate is severe. In the northern part July is the warmest month, with an average temperature of 62.6° F. (17° C.), and January the coldest, with an average temperature of —0.4° F. (—18° C.). At Otomari, in the Japanese part, August is the warmest month, with a mean temperature of 62.6° F. (17° C.), January the coldest, with a mean temperature of 12° F. (—11° C.).

The rainfall is heavy, especially in summer, and destructive floods sometimes occur. At Otomari the total rainfall is 19.27 inches (48.95 cm.), the number of rainy days 106, and the maximum fall in 24 hours 2.25 inches (5.72 cm.). The wettest months on the average are September and October and the driest December and February. Snow falls on 99 days in the year; it begins in October and continues till May. Frost begins in September and lasts till June; the bays along the eastern shore freeze and drift ice appears as late as July. Frequent thick fogs are the worst feature of the climate; they are especially dangerous in La Perouse Strait during the summer months. The western shore enjoys better conditions than the eastern, despite cold fogs and sharp sea winds; but for several months in the year the straits are frozen. The prevalent winds are north and northwest in winter, and south, southeast, or east in summer.

(4) SANITARY CONDITIONS.

Malaria and scurvy are the most prevalent diseases upon the island, consumption and infectious diseases being comparatively rare. Neglect of hygienic rules is one of the principal causes of mortality, and a frequently fatal disease is "leg dropsy."

(5) RACE AND LANGUAGE.

The Japanese, who have been developing their new possession and emigrating to it in great numbers, are by far the largest element in the population. The Russians have almost all withdrawn from Japanese Sakhalin. The aboriginal population is dwindling and does not now amount to much more than 3,000 in all.

The chief tribe is that of the Gilyaks, who occupy the northern part of Sakhalin. Their affinities are puzzling, and it is probable that a large infusion of Mongol blood has profoundly modified the original type, which is supposed to be Palaeo-Siberian. The Gilyaks have been less corrupted by contact with civilized people than many other tribes of the Far East. Their language appears to be a quite distinct tongue.

The Ainus are found in the Japanese part of Sakhalin and are a Palaeo-Siberian tribe very difficult to classify. The hairiness for which they are popularly known has been much exaggerated, and is not greater than that of many Europeans, though it differentiates them strongly from the Mongol tribes. Their tongue is also quite distinct; they are unacquainted with writing and have no literature.

The Oroks occupy settlements along the east coast and in the interior of Sakhalin. They are a tribe of Tungusic stock. About 200 Tungus are found in the tundra country along the lower course of the Poronai.

(6) POPULATION.

Distribution.

In 1911 the population of the Russian part of the island was 7,535, and of the Japanese part 36,725; but in the latter the numbers have greatly increased, the figures quoted for 1917 by the Financial and Economic Annual of Japan being 68,207, of whom 38,403 were males and 29,804 females. There are few Russians anywhere outside a radius of 30 miles from Alexandrovsk. The aboriginal population was in 1905 estimated at 2,000 Gilyaks, 1,300 Ainus, 750 Oroks, 200 Tungus, and 13 Yakuts, but these totals were almost certainly too high.

Towns and villages.

Russian Sakhalin: The center of government is Alexandrovsk, on the west coast opposite De Castries Bay; to-day it has probably a population of about 1,200.

Due lies on the west coast, a few miles south of Alexandrovsk. It is the center of the coal industry, and under the Russian régime was the most frequented harbor in the island. The settlement consists of a few houses and barracks for troops. Derbensk and Rikovsk were built as convict settlements.

Japanese Sakhalin: The capital is Toyohara, population 12,900, which is an agricultural center 25 miles north of Otomari. Otomari, population 16,000, is a treaty port open to foreign trade, and is the principal port in Japanese Sakhalin. Mauka, or Maoka, population about 19,000, on the west coast, the second in importance of the Japanese ports, is a flourishing place and seems destined to become the chief port in the island, as it is free from ice all the year. It is the center of the herring fishery. Manue and Kusunai are both on a good road, which crosses the island. Shikika has an open roadstead near the mouth of the Poronai. Sakaehama, an important coast settlement, is at the mouth of the River Naibuchi.

MOVEMENT.

The Russian population has greatly diminished; in 1911 it is said to have fallen to 5,158. The aboriginal population is also dwindling. The Japanese population, on the other hand, has increased enormously since the annexation of Karafuto, and in December, 1911, numbered 36,725, but this is less than three-fifths of the summer population. The average increase of the population in the five years ending 1917 was 104.69 per 1,000. The figures given in the Financial and Economic Annual of Japan are—1914, 57,206; 1915, 60,660; 1916, 64,323; 1917, 68,207.

Emigration from Japan is the main reason for the increase. The numbers who crossed to the island from Japan were in 1910, 28,688; in 1911, 31,416.

II. POLITICAL HISTORY.

CHRONOLOGICAL SUMMARY.

1613. Reputed Japanese discovery of the south coast of Sakhalin.
1649. European discovery of Sakhalin by Martin Vries.
1700. Chinese dominion over the north of the island.
Japanese (Prince of Matsumai's) dominion over the south of the island.
1785. Manchus appoint overseers in the north.
Japanese Shogunate takes direct interest in the island.
1805–8. Mamia Rinzo's expedition through the island.
1807. Lieutenant Koostov takes possession of the island for Russia.
1853. First official Russian settlements on the island.
1860. Treaty of Peking. Cession of Primorsk to Russia.
1867. Convention between Japan and Russia.
1875. Treaty between Japan and Russia.
1905. Conquest of Sakhalin by Japan.
1905. Treaty of Portsmouth (United States of America).
1907. Fisheries agreement; Japan gains fishing privileges on the Russian Pacific coasts.

(1) Discovery and early connections with Japan, China, and Russia.

Although legends of the Gilyaks of northern Sakhalin tell of their arrival from the banks of the lower Amur less than 300 years ago, it is certain that the earliest civilized visitors found people of that type in the north of the island and also Ainus in the south.

From time immemorial invasions of the island appear to have followed two routes—the northern and the southern. Members of the Gilyak Tribe must have filtered from their ancestral villages on the lower Amur into the northern half of the island centuries ago, while the arrival of the Ainus from Japan in the southern portion of the island probably dates from an even more remote period. As it was with the early peopling of the island, so also has it been during the last three centuries. The Chinese arrived in northern Sakhalin by the River Amur, and were succeeded by the Russians; in the south of the island the Japanese followed in the footsteps of the Ainus.

The discovery of Sakhalin in 1649 is attributed to the Dutch captain, Martin Vries; he named its easternmost point Cape Patience, and anchored in the Bay of Aniva, which faces south toward Yezo, the northern island of Japan; but in an eighteenth century Japanese geographical account it is claimed that during the Shogunate of Fidia-toda (1605–1622) the Prince of Matsumai, Kinfiro, ruler of Yezo, sent an expedition to survey Karafuto; it returned the following year to the island and wintered there. No settlement appears to have been made, and Vries 30 years later reported only Ainu natives on the south and east coasts. A later Prince of Matsumai (1688–1703) sent officials to the island and claimed to have established his dominion over the southern half of Sakhalin by the year 1700. A map or a copy, made in 1782, is said to exist, which he presented to the Shogun as a sign of the offering of dominion. Eleven of the divisions of Sakhalin and several of the Kurile Islands have been identified on this map, which also shows 81 Japanese and 140 mixed native and Japanese villages. Such a Japanese settlement of the southern portion of the island in the early eighteenth century seems at least doubtful, but another source confirms the existence at this period of a lively trade between Matsumai and the Ainus of Karafuto.

The succeeding princes of the Matsumai dynasty were unsupported by the Tokugawa dynasty, and their influence waned before the advance from the north of the Manchus, who in the last quarter of the eighteenth century had encroached seriously on their trade. It was not until after the accession of the Manchu dynasty to the throne of China (1644) that interest even in Manchuria was awakened in the Empire.

The first notable result, in part due to the influence of the Jesuit fathers at the court of the Emperor K'ank-hsi (1661–1722), was the treaty of Nertchinsk (1689), which checked the Russian advance down the Amur River. Ten years later, according to a Japanese historian (Togo Yoshida, Karafuto under the Prince of Matsumai), a Chinese general, Koklio, was dispatched with a large force down the River Amur and across the sea to a large island which, or at least its northern part, he seems to have annexed. The same authority adds that the Chinese were dominant in the north of the island about the year 1700. It seems improbable, if this military expedition occurred so early as 1699, that it would have been unknown to the Jesuit fathers who were sent by K'ang-hsi in 1709 to map eastern Tartary; they reported that their first knowledge of the island was gained from natives on the Amur, and added that the Emperor later sent Manchus to Sakhalin, who brought back a careful geographical and topographical account of the northern half of the island. Perhaps it was this survey which appeared at Peking in 1776 in the twenty-fourth volume of a hydrographical work on China, collated from the earlier Great Official Description of the Empire.

From 1785 the Shogunate Government took a direct interest in the island, sending an expedition in that year to Yezo, whence Oisha Ippei was dispatched to Sakhalin to learn from the Manchus what area they claimed. About this time both the Manchus and the Japanese became alarmed at the activities of "foreign ships." The Manchus, according to Mamia Rinzo, appointed certain of the natives overseers of various districts, and tried to bind the natives by a solemn agreement to trade only with themselves; but from the beginning of the nineteenth century we hear nothing of Manchu claims, although their traders from the lower Amur continued to visit the island as they had probably done for the previous 200 years. On the other hand, Japanese fears of Russian aggression led to the dispatch of several expeditions, the most notable of which—that of Mamia Rinzo in 1805–8—resulted in the discovery that Sakhalin was an island, and left us a map and description of it.

The Russian arrival overland in these regions was comparatively late; and, although Poyarkov had descended the Amur in 1644, Russian progress, except in the direction of Kamchatka, was checked for 160 years by the Chinese (treaty of Nertchinsk, 1689; for the text of this treaty, see Eastern Siberia, No. 55, p. 92). Nevertheless, Russian ships were seen in the north Pacific from the year 1720; and in 1800 the Tokugawa librarian, Hondo Juzo, found and destroyed pillars of occupation set up by the Russians on the island of Iturup (Kuriles). In 1807 a Russian, Lieutenant Koostov, with the permission of Ambassador Riazonov, took possession of Sakhalin for Russia; but in 1813 Vice Admiral Golovnin, who had been seized by the Japanese three years earlier as he was surveying one of the southern Kurile Islands, obtained his release by disavowing Koostov's act and formally renouncing Russia's claims to Sakhalin.

This period witnessed the growing importance of the fisheries of southern Sakhalin in the hands of the Japanese. There existed many fishing stations with storehouses, especially on the west coast; and a commissioner with underofficials and a Government depot was stationed at Kusunkotan (later Korsakovsk). Fur trading continued with the Ainus and Gilyaks, and there were a few allotments under cultivation.

(2) Russian occupation and negotiations with Japan, 1850–75.

Russia, dependent for a century and a half on mere forest tracks—impassable during most of the summer—for land communications with her posts in Kamchatka and along the Okhotsk coasts, had cast longing eyes on the Amur River as a convenient highway. Any attempt to use the river, however, would involve risk of a clash with China, and farther advance might embroil her with Japan.

In 1846 Lieutenant Govrilov had explored the mouth of the Amur and had reported (inaccurately) against its navigability. Moreover, Count Nesselrode, the Russian foreign minister, was fearful of offending China. The Czar, however, was interested in far-eastern Siberia, and appointed General (afterwards Count) Muraviev Governor General of eastern Siberia in 1847, with instructions to study the Amur region. Count Nevelskoy's activity on the east Siberian littoral under Count Muraviev led to the establishment in 1853–1855 of small Russian posts in the south of Sakhalin, also at Due on the west coast opposite De Castries Bay, where on the mainland a Russian post had been established in 1849. Due was chosen as a fur-trading place, but in the same year the discovery of coal there and exaggerated reports of its value led to increased activity on the part of the Government. In 1853 Admiral Putiatin had advised Count Nevelskoy that the annexation of Sakhalin, following the imperial order of April 11, 1853, for its occupation, must involve trouble with Japan, and three years later it fell to him to sign a treaty with Japan, article 2 of which provided that—the boundaries between Russia and Japan are in future between Iturup and Urup. The whole island of Iturup belongs to Japan, the island of Urup with the north Kuriles to Russia, while the island of Krafto (Sakhalin) is neutral ground between the two Empires.

Count Muraviev found in the Crimean War and the Anglo-French expedition to Peking his opportunity for expansion. During the former he largely increased his forces for the "defense of the Pacific coast," and with this as a makeweight, in the hour of China's weakness, negotiated the treaties of Aigun (1858) and Peking (1860), by which Russia obtained the Ussuri and the Primorsk (coast) regions. No mention of Sakhalin occurs in these treaties, and China's claim to the island can only be said to have lapsed incidentally to Russia, no such plea indeed having been publicly preferred by the latter. Moreover, Russia had previously to the treaties begun fencing with Japan over the island.

During the next few years the weak Tokugawa dynasty—fearing Russian aggression—dispatched envoys at intervals to St. Petersburg; but they met with little success, since Russia coveted the reputedly rich coal mines of Sakhalin and the Bay of Aniva, which for a large part of the year is ice-free. To Japan it appeared that the whole island was slipping from her grasp by diplomatic processes. When, therefore, in 1862, Russia demanded that the boundary line should be the forty-eighth parallel, an arrangement which would have given her more than four-fifths of the island, Japan expressed her willingness to compromise and to divide the island on the fiftieth parallel. This offer was not accepted; and in 1865 Russia offered to exchange the Kurile Islands, to which Japan had an equal claim, for the Japanese claims on Sakhalin. On March 18, 1867, these negotiations were suspended for a few years by a curious convention which gave to each power "the common right of joint occupation," and to members of both nations permission to "occupy" unoccupied places all over the island. An immediate race for occupation was the result. Japan, populous and near at hand, readily furnished colonists, whereas Russia, being far away, could at best send ex-soldiers and convicts, but no women. The Russians, thus handicapped in the race, erected inscribed posts to denote that occupation had taken place. The Japanese followed suit. In 1860, 800 convicts were dispatched from Trans-Baikalia to work the coal mines at Due. Although there was no local collision, this anomalous state of things could not continue; and on April 25, 1875, Japan, alarmed at Russia's growing power in the Far East, gave way, accepting in lieu of her claim to Sakhalin the Kurile Islands and an annual payment for a fixed number of years. She also agreed to station a consul at Korsakovsk during the summer months to levy on account of Russia a pro rata tax on the Japanese fishermen. It was a diplomatic defeat for Japan; but she had saved that for which Sakhalin was most valuable to her, namely, the right to fish on the southern coasts of the island.

(3) Russian possession, 1875–1905.

It is instructive to contrast the differing significance of the island to the Chinese, the Japanese, and the Russians. The Chinese and their Manchu subjects regarded it as a fur-trading center; the Japanese valued it mainly for its rich fisheries; the Russians were first attracted by reports of rich coal mines, but the poor results yielded by backward methods and convict labor disappointed them, and they came to look upon the island merely as a convenient dumping ground for convicts.

Sakhalin, indeed, proved to be a gaol in itself. It was easy to escape from prison, but not from the island. Russia's penal policy affected Sakhalin, and Sakhalin reacted on that policy. The Siberiaks of the seventies and eighties urged the familiar colonial objection to their country being overrun by escaped convicts and ex-convicts. Moreover, the exchequer was interested, since security of life and property in Siberia spelled greater potential receipts. In 1888 M. Galkin Vrasskoy—afterwards head of the general prison administration—recommended that all "vagabonds" should be sent in future to Sakhalin; and shortly before this female convicts were sent to the island, the simplest form of legal marriage being permitted, in order to bring about the settlement of ex-convicts on the island.

Sakhalin was divided into three administrative districts (okrugi), of which the chief places were Alexandrovsk on the west coast, Korsakovsk in the south, and Rikovsk in the center. At the head of each district was a chief or nachalnik, assisted by a doctor, an inspector of colonies, and a small garrison consisting of one company. Prisons were situated in each of the chief towns and in a few others, and for a short radius around these, in clearings, there were 99 small settlements of ex-convicts and those convicts who were allowed to perform their hard-labor duty outside the prison. Over all was the military governor, having his official residence at Alexandrovsk and responsible to the governor general of eastern Siberia at Khabarovsk, on the Amur.

Taking the Government statistics of January 1, 1898, as typical of the period, the population of the island comprised 31,964 Russians and 4,134 natives. Of the Russians there were 19,770 men and 2,397 women who had been sent to Sakhalin as convicts. Only 7,080—3,446 men and 634 women—of these convicts were at hard-labor duty; the rest, having done their term, had become "exile settlers." Among the hard-labor convicts were 76 political exiles. The free population consisted of 1,308 women and 6 men, who had followed their convict spouses, several thousand children of convict parents, and about 2,000 officials and soldiers.

The bulk of the convicts lived outside the six prisons, the unmarried men in barracks, and all, including many from the prisons, worked at logging, coal mining, and various domestic jobs for the officials. Ex-convicts were allotted uncleared land, seed potatoes, and rations for a year, and after a residence of six years, subject to good conduct, could cross to the mainland if they were offered work there or had obtained sufficient money. The Government regulations were in general humane, but were largely nullified by the maladministration of officials. With convict and ex-convict labor it is not surprising that no industry flourished. The coal mining produced from all the mines only about 36,000 tons a year; agriculture was of the poorest and grazing little better. Fishing, except in the southern half of the island, was confined to the rivers and scarcely counted even in local consumption.

In the south of the island, although many Japanese had left after 1875, the larger share of the fisheries was still in the hands of their countrymen It is necessary to explain the extreme importance attached to these by the Japanese. Japan is still largely an agricultural country and depends upon intensive cultivation. Fish is therefore necessary to her, not merely as a food but as manure. Until the Chino-Japanese War haricot pods from China and Korea had been used as a substitute for guano. When these supplies were cut off the Japanese came to realize the value of fish manure, which, although five times the price, is far superior in chemical properties. With the increase of shipping, and particularly of steam shipping, the schools of fish, notably herring, have to a large extent been frightened from the coasts of Japan, so that Sakhalin is increasingly valuable to her.

The attitude of the Russian Government toward the natives, who are peaceable, was paternal, but rather passively so than actively. It interfered little with them, and so long as no trouble arose they were allowed to regulate their lives by the customs of the tribe, the chief man of each village being appointed its responsible head. Unfortunately, the activity of the lower officials and ex-convict traders was in contrast to the Government's passivity, for in contravention of Government regulations they traded vodka for valuable skins. Further, by the march of civilization and competition on the part of ex-convicts, the natives lost river fishing stations, their winter store of fish was thus reduced, and they became liable to starvation and epidemics in the late winter. Occasionally in such crises the Government distributed food.

(4) Japanese conquest, 1905.

The cession of the island to Russia in 1875 caused considerable excitement in Japan, and it was to be expected that the latter would seize the first opportunity in the Russo-Japanese War to retake it. This opportunity did not arise until after the defeat of the Baltic fleet in the Tsushima Straits on May 27 and 28, 1905. Two naval squadrons with transports were forthwith dispatched from Japan to Sakhalin, the first disembarking in the Bay of Aniva on July 7, 1905. The Russian forces, inferior in number, were defeated and driven northward into the forests of the interior. The second squadron landed troops on the west coast at Arkova, Alexandrovsk, and Due on July 24, and quickly driving the enemy eastward to Derbensk in the center, overtook them in the forests to the south and defeated them at Palevo. On July 31 the military governor of Sakhalin, with 70 officers and 3,200 rank and file, surrendered. The following day Lieutenant General Haraguchi proclaimed military administration over the whole of the island, and on August 6 the civil administration staff left Tokyo for Karafuto.

The news of the result of the conference at Portsmouth, United States of America, led to considerable agitation in Tokyo, and the press had to be muzzled. Great expectations of the advantageous terms to be exacted by their victorious arms had been cherished by the Japanese public, but the financial weakness of Japan and the clever maneuvering of M. de Witte doomed them to early disappointment. Apparently the negotiations between Russian and Japanese envoys reached a deadlock. At this point President Roosevelt is said to have suggested to the Czar the cession of the southern part of Sakhalin to Japan and a payment for the other half. The latter provision savored of an indemnity and the Czar refused; but when the negotiators met again, M. de Witte proposed the cession of the southern half of the island to Japan and Baron Komura accepted the offer.

Of the Portsmouth treaty—September 5, 1905—articles 9, 10, 11, and an additional article concern Sakhalin:

Article 9 reads:

> The Imperial Government of Russia cedes to the Imperial Government of Japan in perpetuity and full sovereignty the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin, and all of the islands adjacent thereto, and the public works and properties thereon. The fiftieth degree of north latitude is adopted as the limit of the ceded territory. The exact alignment of this territory shall be determined in accordance with the provisions of the additional article 2 annexed to this treaty. Japan and Russia mutually agree not to construct in their respective possessions on the island of Sakhalin or the adjacent islands any fortifications or other similar military works. They also respectively engage not to take any military measures which might impede the free navigation of the Straits of La Perouse and the Strait of Tartary.

Article 11 reads:

> Russia engages to arrange with Japan for granting to Japanese subjects rights of fishing along the coasts of the Russian possessions in the Japanese, Okhotsk, and Bering Seas. It is agreed that the foregoing engagement shall not affect rights already belonging to Russian subjects or foreigners in those regions.

Article 10 provides for the safety and protection of Russian subjects in the area ceded to Japan; and additional article 2, referred to in article 9, provides for a commission to delimit the boundary and to prepare a list and description of the adjacent islands comprised in the cession and maps showing the boundary.

This arrangement was completed by the Russo-Japanese fisheries agreement of 1907, by which Japanese fishing guilds and companies acquired leases of fishing rights in Russian territorial waters while Russian concerns operating both on the coast and on rivers were allowed to employ Japanese labor in certain cases. Altogether some 13,000 Japanese fishermen and laborers spend the summer at stations along the Asiatic Russian littoral. Thus one of the chief sources of income of the Hokkaido (Japan) is outside its boundaries, and its prosperity is largely dependent on the success of fisheries on a foreign shore.

III. SOCIAL AND POLITICAL CONDITIONS.

(1) RELIGIOUS.

(a) North Sakhalin.

(a) Natives: The few hundred natives are Shamanists: for them nature, animate and inanimate, possesses spirits; and the medicine man (in the Gilyak tongue, the Cham) exorcises the bad and attracts the good demons. The bear festival in January, at which the animal is sacrificed and his spirit speeded to the God of the Mountains, is the greatest religious and social event in their calendar. Although the Gilyaks are included by M. Patkanov (Essai d'une statistique * * * des peuples palaeasiatiques de la Sibérie) as Christians, there is not a sign of their conversion; it is otherwise with the Oroks, who have cut off their pigtails and added, at least in one or two of their huts, an ikon to their collection of charms. The Russian priest is not above the temptation to supply vodka in exchange for valuable sable skins. Once a year he makes a journey to the center of the island during the hunting season to baptize Orok children and read the burial service for deceased members; but the natives do not respond with alacrity, since many sable skins have to be given for these privileges.

(b) Russians: The orthodox Catholic religion obtains among the majority of Russians. All officials have to receive the communion once a year; but it is not difficult to arrange with the priest for evasion of this obligation. Exceptions to the law are made in favor of those of other acknowledged religions. There were, besides the Russian church at Alexandrovsk, a Lutheran church and a Mohammedan mosque. In 1898 there were 67 prisoners doing hard labor who were sentenced on account of their religious belief. The number of churches officially reported for the whole island before the Russo-Japanese War was 26, but there are really about half a dozen only in the northern area, Alexandrovsk, Due, Derbensk, and Rikovsk each having 1. The priest occasionally visits the 40 or 50 outlying settlements and reads a short service at a spot marked by a cross.

(b) South Sakhalin.

(a) Natives: Except for a very few Gilyaks, the natives of South Sakhalin are Ainus. They are said to believe in a great creator, but otherwise are animists, seeing spirits in most natural forms. A patriarch of the village performs their ceremonies, and they have no shamans. The bear festival is the great event of the year, and they have even been called on this account "bear worshippers." As the Japanese do not proselytize, the Buddhist and Shintoist priests do not carry on any missions among them.

(b) Japanese: The recent growth of the national spirit among the Japanese, particularly during the Russo-Japanese War, led to the revival of Shintoism; so that it is no longer true to say that Shintoism ushers the Japanese into life and Buddhism attends and buries him. Both these religions are represented in Sakhalin, the former by 4 sects with 11 shrines and the latter by 6 sects and 73 temples. There are also four Christian churches—two so-called Japanese Episcopalian and two Roman Catholic.

(2) POLITICAL.

(a) North Sakhalin.

The military governor of the island resides at Nikolaevsk, on the Amur, and visits his official residence at Alexandrovsk once or twice a year, a deputy general being in charge. A small garrison, nominally a battalion, is stationed in the island. Theoretically the officials are interested in the development of the island, but the schemes put forward have not materialized after years of talk.

(b) South Sakhalin.

Karafuto is divided into five administrative districts (cho) under prefects. The governor has his seat at Toyohara, having moved his capital northward—25 miles—from Otomari. A small garrison is posted at the latter place, one of the companies of a scattered battalion.

(3) EDUCATIONAL.

(a) North Sakhalin.

(a) Natives: Among the natives of North Sakhalin, of whom the great majority are Gilyaks, there are no educational facilities. Two or three individuals have been known to learn Russian and to reside for a time in Russian towns, but the white man's life has not suited them.

(b) Russians: Statistics show that the Russians, before the Japanese conquest of the island, had 32 schools with 800 pupils, of which perhaps one-half are in the existing Russian portion of the island. These were in most cases small village schools, dependent for their existence on the presence of a political exile as teacher. The number has probably decreased with the diminution of the population. Under the present system Sakhalin falls in the fifteenth division of the general Amur educational district. In a division of an oblast such as is Sakhalin, primary education is provided by the local authority or by private persons. The schools are of the primary grade, and for higher education it is necessary to go to the mainland.

(b) South Sakhalin.

(a) Natives: Under the Japanese in 1917 there were among the natives 12 "teaching places," with 202 pupils, conducted at an expense of 4,838 yen.

(b) Japanese: A complete national system of education was established in the Japanese Empire in 1873 and remodeled in 1886. Primary schools prepare for the middle, followed by the high schools, which in turn prepare for the universities. In South Sakhalin there were in 1916 three Government primary schools with 2,628 pupils, one Government middle school with 225 pupils, and a Government higher girls' school with 48 pupils. The cost of these was 67,159 yen. In addition to these, there were 105 private primary schools with 5,420 pupils, with a total expenditure of 74,009 yen. Commercial and technical schools in Japan are largely private, but there is no mention of such existing on the island.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

In considering the claims to the island we may dismiss the question usually raised by the presence of subject native races. The proposal to give back the island to them can not be effectively urged. There are four different tribes, numbering all told about 3,000 individuals, and gradually diminishing. They are still in the hunting stage.

The coal of the island is of good quality and the quantity of fair promise. Its future may be brighter when harbor facilities remove its handicap in competing with Japanese and north China coal.

IV. ECONOMIC CONDITIONS.

(A) MEANS OF COMMUNICATION.

(1) INTERNAL.

(a) Roads, paths, and tracks.

The greater part of the island of Sakhalin is covered with primeval forest, and the means of communication are therefore defective; the few roads that exist have been cut through the jungle by convict labor. There are also a few paths, made by widening bear tracks. The natives travel chiefly by river.

The main road of the island during the period of Russian rule started from the coal mines of Due on the west coast and ran to Alexandrovsk, the seat of government, a distance of about 8 miles. It then ran northward to Arkovo, a village near the coast, whence it turned inland, crossed the backbone of the island, and dropped down on the other side to Derbensk, on the upper waters of the Tim, 35 miles from Alexandrovsk. At this point a corduroy road and cleared track descended the Tim to Slavo, but the main road turned southward for 9 miles, to Rikovsk. The total length was 44 miles of well-made road. Beyond Rikovsk the road became merely a cleared track, following for 200 miles the swampy right bank of the Poronai, and thence proceeding along the east coast through Naibuchi and Vladimirovka to Korsakovsk, which under the Russians was the chief prison and administrative center of the south.

For a few miles out of Rikovsk there was a road on the left bank of the Poronai, passing through the village of Longari. From Alexandrovsk there was also a short road inland to Novo Mikhailovsk, which may be termed a suburb, and thence a track to Rikovsk. In winter the natives with their dog sledges used the beach, or rather the frozen fringe of the sea, as a mail route to Cape Pogobi, whence they crossed the frozen sea to the mainland. It was also considered safer to make the journey from Alexandrovsk to Arkovo, and the latter half of that from Alexandrovsk to Due, by the beach at low tide, instead of by the road, as the traveler thus reduced the chances of attack to one side only.

Korsakovsk in the south was the center of a few Russian roads which began bravely enough, but ended as mere tracks. One ran northward to the village of Takoi, beyond Vladimirovka, and another linked up Korsakovsk with Muravievsk, on the southeast and with Mauka on the west coast. At the narrowest part of the island a Russian track connected the villages of Manue on the east coast and Kusunai on the west.

After the acquisition by Japan of the southern part of the island, new towns were laid out at Toyohara (Russian, Vladimirovka), Otomari (Korsakovsk), and Mauka, and a highway was constructed across the backbone of the island from Toyohara, the capital, to Mauka on the west coast. Another was made later from Toyohara southwest to Cape Notoro. The Russian highways and tracks were converted into roads 15 feet in width, and bridges were built. These roads and bridges, however, leave something to be desired, and better provision is necessary if the economic expansion of the colony is to continue. By 1911 the Government had established 53 ferries, carrying passengers at small fees, or without charge, and had granted subsidies to 73 road stages providing lodgings, horses, and porters. Notwithstanding their conservatism, the Japanese are using Russian carts on these roads. In winter, communication is maintained between Toyohara and Mauka by Ainu dog sledges and with the Russian part of the island by native reindeer sledges.

(b) Rivers.

The chief rivers, the Tim and the Poronai, are shallow, and their mouths have to be approached cautiously on account of sand banks or dunes. The Poronai is navigable a few miles up—as far as Poroto—by vessels of 4½ feet draft. The Tim, from Derbensk to its mouth, a distance of about 200 miles, is said to have 11 rapids, 89 sand banks, and many obstructions formed by fallen trees.

The rivers are the main highways for the natives, who use them for canoe traffic in the summer and as roads for sledges when frozen in the winter.

(c) Railways.

There is no railway in the Russian area. Rails are laid down from Alexandrovsk to the jetty, a distance of about 1½ miles.

During the Russo-Japanese War the Japanese military administration built a light railway of 3 feet 6 inches gauge from Otomari (Sakaemachin Station) to Toyohara; this was opened to the public in 1909. In 1911 it was extended to Sakaehama, a total length of about 56 miles, thus linking up Aniva Bay with the east coast. This railway is said to connect the four wood-pulp factories which the Japanese have established at Otomari, Tomariaru, Toyohara, and Ochiai.

(d) Posts, telegraphs, and telephones.

In the Russian portion of Sakhalin mails are delivered by the Russian volunteer fleet of steamers to Alexandrovsk. During about three months of midwinter mails are carried by native dog sledges over the frozen sea between the island and Nikolaevsk, near the mouth of the Amur. The Russians had a telegraph system along the roads linking up the principal prisons, which were connected also by the weekly post from Alexandrovsk.

The Japanese have a mail service three times a month by steamer from Hakodate. They have maintained and extended the Russian telegraph system. Postal, telegraph, and telephone offices are established in the chief towns, Toyohara, Otomari, Mauka, Shikika, Nayoshi, and Nishi-Notoro. There are 16 subordinate post offices, two of which are also telephone exchanges.

(2) EXTERNAL.

Under Russian rule Sakhalin suffered seriously from the want of regular communication with the mainland. In the winter there was no communication, except for the months during which sledges could be used, and even in the summer, when the sea was open, there was no harbor available.

(a) Ports.

Alexandrovsk and Due are mere open roadsteads. Alexandrovsk has a pier 350 yards long, and in order to develop the coal-mining industry it has been decided to construct a properly equipped port there. At Due ships have to lie two-thirds of a mile out.

Mauka, on the west coast, is another open roadstead, but it has the distinction of being almost free from ice in winter, and it seems destined to become, if it has not already become, the most flourishing port of Japanese Sakhalin. To-day it possesses a larger population (19,000) than any other town on the island.

Otomari, which includes Sakaemachi, 1 mile distant, is closed by ice for about three months in the year, but in the open season it affords safe anchorage, except with winds from the south and west. Four short piers and one longer one, with a depth of 6 fathoms at its end, have been built, but ships generally unload into lighters.

Minor ports are Sakaehama, on the east coast, and Ushiyara, on the west coast, but at both the anchorage is most insecure. Ships must lie some distance offshore and load and unload by means of lighters.

From time immemorial Japanese junks have anchored in the Bay of Ni within shelter of the sand dunes to trade with the native Gilyaks, Oroks, and Tungus. Unfortunately, on this coast fogs prevail from the end of April into July.

The only available records of shipping are for Japanese vessels entering Otomari. In 1912 that port was visited by 31 steamships, with a total tonnage of 18,186, and two sailing vessels of 205 tons. In 1914, 36 Japanese steamships, of 16,451 tons, entered and 26, of 10,159 tons, cleared; in the same year 1 sailing vessel of 114 tons entered and 3 of 478 tons cleared.

(b) Shipping lines.

Between Russian Sakhalin and the mainland communications are maintained from the middle of April to the end of October by steamers of the Russian volunteer fleet; there are 16 sailings from Vladivostok to Nikolaevsk, and the ships call at Alexandrovsk on the outward and return journeys. An occasional tramp steamer calls at Due or Vladimirsk for coal.

In Japanese Sakhalin shipping communications are regular and frequent in the open season. There is a service during the summer to Otomari from Hakodate and Otaru, with nine sailings per month, provided partly by the steamers of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha and partly by the small steamships of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha; the latter call twice monthly from April to December at Sakaehama and minor ports on the east coast of the island. There is also said to be a coasting service of the Kita Nippon Kisen Kaisha's vessels.

(c) Cables and wireless communication.

A Russian submarine cable is laid between Cape Pogobi on Sakhalin and Cape Lazarev on the mainland. There was an older cable connecting Alexandrovsk with the mainland at De Castries Bay; this was broken in 1901, but is reported to have been repaired.

The Japanese have a cable from Alexandrovsk to the island of Todoshima (Kaibato), off the southwest coast, and thence to the island of Yezo.

The nearest wireless stations are at Nikolaevsk, on the Siberian mainland, and on the Japanese island of Yezo.

(B) INDUSTRY.

(1) LABOR.

(a) Supply of labor; emigration and immigration.

Since the Russo-Japanese War Sakhalin has ceased to be a penal settlement, and the prisons now house local offenders only. The difficulty in the old days was to provide lucrative work for the prisoner who had served his time. To-day the population of the Russian territory has dwindled to a sixth of what it was, and continues to decrease. In 1911 there were only 5,158 Russians in the northern half of the island, of whom 726 were officials and soldiers, 1,502 ex-convicts, and the rest mostly dependants of these. Rikovsk has only one-third of its houses occupied, and Alexandrovsk is said to have only one-fifth of its former population. In these circumstances there is no question of the supply of labor. With the exception of a few ex-convict traders, the bulk of the population is engaged in growing potatoes, garden produce, and cereals, and barely succeeds in raising enough for its own support. Little economic progress can be expected from the remnants of an ex-convict population, whose most energetic members took the opportunity of the Russo-Japanese War to make their escape to the mainland.

The coal mines at Due and Vladimirsk need labor, but this work does not appeal to the Russian population; hence up to 1914 some 600 Chinese and Koreans were employed in the mines.

The Russian part of the island is unattractive climatically, agriculturally, and socially, and the blight of the penal system is over it; hence it is not surprising that, notwithstanding the inducements offered by the Government, only 30 new families settled during the years 1907 to 1910. The Government offers loans to intending settlers, up to a sum of 400 rubles to each family, on condition that a khodok, or selector, chooses the land they are to occupy. Easy terms of repayment are granted, the sum being divided into 10 annual installments, commencing at the end of five years. In certain cases half the loan may be remitted. To settlers above 15 years of age a postponement of military service for six years is also granted.

No statistics of emigration are available, but the mainland, with its better climate and greater development, especially at Nikolaevsk and Khabarovsk, attracts a few hundred emigrants annually.

With regard to immigration in south Sakhalin, the number of Japanese who visit the island in the summer for the fisheries has increase by tens of thousands since the establishment of Japanese rule. Another stream of immigrants has settled down permanently to cultivate the soil. One record gives the number of families settled on the land up to the end of 1917 as 3,857, and this seems to be confirmed by another report which mentions a total of 17,000 settlers. The impending development of the wood-pulp and match-stick mills may help to steady the demand for labor, which has varied with fluctuating harvests.

The Japanese population, reckoned on June 30, was as follows: Forty-three thousand four hundred and fifty-six in 1908; 57,051 in 1911; 73,568 in 1915; and 76,705 in 1916; these figures, however, include many thousands of migratory fishermen. The seasonal character of this immigration is shown by comparing the above totals with those given in the records for December 31, which were as follows: Twenty-six thousand three hundred and ninety-three in 1908, 36,725 in 1911, 60,660 in 1915, and 64,323 in 1916 (cf. p. 14). Of the total population, three-fifths is said to be engaged in the fisheries.

(b) Labor conditions.

In Russian Sakhalin the people are almost entirely engaged in cultivating their own plots of land, and therefore make their own labor conditions. In some cases they are the victims of careless or unscrupulous officials, who have settled them or their parents before them on entirely unsuitable land. On the whole, the blight of the convict is perhaps the greatest hindrance to the development of a prosperous community.

In Japanese Sakhalin the immigrants have been selected, and their prospective lands carefully chosen. Roads and communications have been made, and no stigma attaches to the population. They also have the distinct advantage of a less inclement climate.

The early arrangements were for settlers, who could afford to do so, to stay at Otomari; and for those who could not, to go to the immigrant "town" near by where they were to await instructions. Carefully selected before leaving their homes, they were allotted 22,500 tsubos (1 tsubo=3.9 square yards), nearly 18½ acres of land and a Russian house. For this they were to pay 6s. per annum to the Government and to keep the house in repair. The land was to become the property of the settler if at the end of five years it had been cultivated to the satisfaction of the authorities.

No report is available of the conditions of those engaged in the fisheries and canneries. In 1908 the majority were migratory, but to-day the migratory element is less than half of the total. Similarly there is no information as to those employed in the wood-product factories.

(2) AGRICULTURE.

(a) Products of commercial value.

Russian official statistics, which err on the optimistic side, state that there are in the Russian part of the island 321,250 acres of good land suitable for cultivation. Of this area about one-half is already occupied by the inhabitants of 27 settlements. It is thus computed that there are still more than 160,000 acres of agricultural land available for immigrants.

The products of the land under cultivation in Russian Sakhalin are very meager. The most favorable report shows that the yield of wheat, barley, and rye is about five and a half fold and that of potatoes ninefold. These crops are all consumed on the island; the rye crop is not even sufficient for local needs. In 1911 there were 1,797 horses, 4,315 cattle, and 1,400 pigs. The Government agricultural school at Rikovsk possesses a small farm and a few head of cattle.

In south Sakhalin the cultivated areas are increasing. The total area cultivated by the 3,857 families stated to have been settled by the end of the year 1917 was 9,485 chos (1 cho=2.45 acres), 23,238 acres. It is further reported that there were more than 438,000 chos (1,073,100 acres) of land in the Japanese territory available for cultivation and pasturage. This figure is, however, probably much exaggerated. This area, added to the total area given by the same authority for the forests, amounts to about 1,350 square miles in excess of the area given for the whole of Japanese Sakhalin.

Barley, wheat, potatoes, beans, cabbages, flax, and hemp are grown successfully on the river margins and in the sheltered valleys. Stock farming is expected to do better on the plains and the lake margins, especially since the large bears have been driven north. Foxes and similar animals are bred for the fur trade.

(b) Forestry.

Forests cover the larger part of Russian Sakhalin. It is stated that their area is 14,766 square miles, but this is almost certainly exaggerated. The chief species of trees are larch, fir, spruce, and birch; the timber is suitable for export, but this has been hindered hitherto by the lack of facilities for transport. The Russians until recently used the forests for fuel and for building their log dwellings; and large areas have been burned through carelessness. Up to 1914 the sawmills at Alexandrovsk provided for local needs; but new developments at Nikolaevsk on the mainland, due to the capture by the Russians of the export trade in fish and its diversion toward Europe, together with the construction of the Amur Railway, have led to a great boom in the timber trade. It is reported that the association of lumbermen of the Amur region has been granted a concession in Sakhalin near the Russo-Japanese boundary, and that they intend to construct their own harbor.

In Japanese Sakhalin the forests belong to the Government, and surveys have been made. The area of the forests was given by the Financial and Economic Annual of Japan for 1918 as 3,352,712 cho, or 12,834 square miles, but, as in the case of the agricultural area, there is little doubt that this figure is too high. It would seem that probably three-quarters of the surface is forested, and that about five-eighths of the forest consists of conifers. The most important trees are the larch (Larix dahurica), the spruce (Picea ayanensis), the fir (Abies sakhalinensis), and the white birch. Larch logs have been sent to Japan in quantities for conversion into railway sleepers and telegraph poles, and the white birch has been found useful for the production of charcoal, calcium acetate, and wood tar. Wood pulp and match sticks have now been added to these products.

3. FISHERIES.

The Russo-Japanese fisheries convention, concluded in 1907 for a period of 12 years, granted to Japanese subjects the right to fish along the coast of the whole of the Russian far eastern possessions on an equal basis with Russians, except in certain "nonconventional" bays and gulfs, reserved for Russians only. The use of vessels under foreign flags is allowed. The stations are put up to auction annually at Vladivostok by the Priamur Department of Domains. Since 1910, when the Russian fishermen on the Amur River captured the trade from the Japanese, the Russians have competed in increasing numbers for the stations off the Pacific coast of Siberia, and have adopted modern equipment and methods of preparation. In 1913 there were 14 stations in Russian Sakhalin, of which 4 were in "nonconventional" waters, while of the 10 in "conventional" waters 5 were leased to Russian concerns and 5 to Japanese.

Fishing is also carried on in the rivers with snares, and in the winter along the sea edge, where breathing holes are made. By these simple methods and some casual sea fishing in the summer the natives and Russian peasants catch for their own use haddock, halibut, trout, ide, smelt, and various kinds of salmon.

The number of fish caught during the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913 off the coast of Russian Sakhalin was as follows:

Year.	Chum salmon (kita).	Humpback salmon (gorbusha).	Herring.
1911	31,000	286,000	12,640,000
1912	16,000	126,000	14,036,000
1913	38,000	183,000	4,483,000

The herring fishery is declining off both parts of the island. Before the Russo-Japanese War the Sakhalin herring fishery district was the most important in the whole Russian Pacific, but now it has become of comparatively small importance.

In southern Sakhalin, even under the Russian régime, the Japanese had maintained the majority of the fishing stations, and a Japanese consul had been stationed at Korsakovsk to regulate the fisheries. For the year 1902 he reported that there were 35 Japanese and 20 Russian undertakings connected with the fisheries of southern Sakhalin. The total fish production for that year was 1,451,680 puds (1 pud equals 36.1 pounds avoirdupois), of which 1,131,600 puds represented fish fertilizer. The total value was 1,500,000 rubles (£158,125). In 1913 the value of the herring fishery alone is stated to have been £330,136, and of the total fishery £581,803.

During the first few years after the Russo-Japanese War there was a lack of control; not only were fish killed before spawning but large numbers were left to die and rot. To-day there is strict Government control, licenses are issued, and whereas there used to be as many as 870 fishing stations on the east coast and 423 on the west, the total number is now restricted to 375.

An experimental fish farm has been established on the west coast, at which investigation and research work are carried on. The chief fishing season is in August, when the herring, the kita or dog salmon, and the gorbusha or humpback salmon arrive off the coast in schools to escape the cold northeastern current. The salmon are cured or salted, but the herrings are mostly prepared for use in fertilizing the rice fields and tea gardens of Japan. The herring fertilizer became of prime importance to Japan after the Chino-Japanese War had cut off the supplies of haricot pods. If the decline of the herring fishery of the Pacific in the years 1916 and 1917 continues, Japan may have to find a substitute for fish guano in soy beans imported from Manchuria. Fishing for crabs has been developed recently, the catch being canned; fishing for cod and karei (flatfish) is also developing.

Bêche de mer or trepang and sea cabbage, valued as delicacies by the Chinese, are obtained off both Russian and Japanese Sakhalin.

4. MINERALS.

The chief mineral product of the island is coal, of which there are considerable deposits. The quality is better than the average Japanese coal and slightly inferior to the best, but is not equal to the coal from Fushun, in Manchuria. The deposits are a commercial asset to be reckoned with in the future, though, owing to the backwardness and inaccessibility of Sakhalin, and to the presence of coal in north Japan, Primorsk, and northern China, the Sakhalin coal is not "ready" for market.

In Russian Sakhalin coal is worked chiefly at Due and Vladimirsk. It is lignite, with about 66 per cent of the caloric value of Welsh coal, and contains 71 per cent of coke. The chief obstacle to its use is the absence of facilities for loading it on shipboard; lighters have to be used for this purpose. Mr. C. H. Hawes (in the Uttermost East, London, 1903) mentions that a steamer of the Chinese Eastern Railway Co. intended to load 2,000 tons, but at the end of three weeks had succeeded in embarking only 150 tons. Other hindrances to development have been the inefficiency of the convict labor and Russian carelessness, which resulted in considerable damage to the mines. After geological surveys had been made it was estimated that the reserve of coal was 16,000,000 tons; the actual production in 1913—an average year—was 36,000 tons.

The lease of the mine at Due (at a royalty to the Government of one-fourth kopeck per pud) expired in 1914, and the lessee company then experimented with a new vein, 4 or 5 miles to the north of Alexandrovsk, thereby hastening its own end. The Government was to put up the lease to public auction for 36 years at Petrograd in 1914, a condition being imposed that the lessee should construct a harbor at Alexandrovsk for general use. The scheme of construction involved the building of a mole from Jonquière Head to the rocks called the Three Brothers, and the cost, as estimated in various projects put forward within the last 20 years, ranged from 3,500,000 to 7,000,000 rubles. Apparently there were no bidders, for the last report (1914) states that the mines are being let on a yearly basis, and are still being worked by Chinese labor. For 30 years the rumor has persisted that one of the most valuable mines is on fire.

In Japanese Sakhalin coal has long been mined at Sertonai, on the west coast near the Russian border, and veins have been located in the southwestern area, particularly in the Notoro Peninsula. Reports are published from time to time of newly located seams, but the results of investigation have proved disappointing. The most recent discovery tells of a seam 60 miles long and 1 to 3 miles broad on the east coast, stretching north from the mouth of the Poronai. The coal obtained, however, is very inferior; it is soft and breaks readily.

A Government coal-mining station has been established on the west coast. It must not be supposed, however, that the coal in the Japanese area is comparable in quality to that of the Russian half of the island. The following statistics of production, given in the Japanese Year Book (Y. Takenobu, Japanese Year Book, 1918; Tokyo, 1918) should be regarded with some caution:

	Tons.
1914	14,653
1915	27,665
1916	37,640

Oil springs and paraffin lakes are found at intervals for a considerable distance along the northeast coast of Sakhalin, especially near Chaivo Bay, on the Boatassin Creek, and Nutovo River. The discovery was officially reported in 1894, and the first shallow boring was made in 1900. An English company just before the Russo-Japanese War sent out an expedition which made a careful geological and analytical examination. Since then other important expeditions from Europe and the Orient have inspected the area and spent considerable sums in tests, but it yet remains to be proved that oil exists in commercially paying quantities.

The rumors from Japanese sources of the existence of "oil veins" in south Sakhalin have not been substantiated.

Iron mines exist in the north of Russian Sakhalin, but, as they have been only fitfully worked by the Russian Government, it seems that they do not promise to be of much value. Iron pyrites is found in Japanese Sakhalin, particularly in the Notoro Peninsula.

Alluvial gold has been discovered in both north and south Sakhalin in small quantities. There are Japanese reports, to which too much importance should not be attached, of the presence of silver and copper in the Naiko district. Amber is found on the shore of the Bay of Patience.

(5) MANUFACTURES.

In Russian Sakhalin the Gilyaks, Oroks, and Tungus hew out canoes and manufacture clothing out of dogskins. The Russian peasants are almost entirely engaged on the land, and there are no manufactures on any considerable scale. There is a small iron foundry at Alexandrovsk.

In Japanese Sakhalin there are four wood-pulp mills, each with an annual production valued at £10,000. There are several canning factories. A dry distillate factory was established at Toyohara in 1911 for utilizing the white birch, the elm, and other broad-leaved trees. In the production of charcoal, calcium acetate, and wood tar, 43,200 kokus (1 koku equals 10 cubic feet) of timber (432,000 cubic feet) are reported to be used annually.

(C) COMMERCE.

(1) DOMESTIC.

Principal branches of trade.

In Russian Sakhalin there is some traffic between the native tribes and the Russians, the former supplying furs in exchange for gunpowder and shot, potatoes, vodka, and tobacco. Also, at the time of the annual bear festival bears are frequently purchased with Russian supplies. These tribes also barter furs with the Japanese, who come to the Bay of Ni on the northeast coast for rice, cauldrons, kettles, and needles, and with the Manchu traders, who come from the mainland to some central spot on the Tim for Chinese cotton cloth (ta-pu) and coins to adorn the skirts of Gilyak ladies.

Amongst the Russian inhabitants themselves there is little trade. The peasants are almost self-sufficing, and such trade as exists consists merely of the sale of the small surplus of the products of their farms or gardens and the purchase from the few general stores at Alexandrovsk, Derbensk, Rikovsk, and Slavo of such articles as hardware, clothing, brick tea, rice, tobacco, and gunpowder and shot.

In Japanese Sakhalin the Ainus traffic in furs, although they are more and more engaged in transport with dog and reindeer sledges and in the fisheries. The settlers in this part have better markets for their produce than those in the northern part of the island, since they can sell to the thousands of fishermen engaged along the coasts.

(2) FOREIGN.

The chief articles of export from Russian Sakhalin are fish, coal, and furs.

Fish is exported in quantities nearly equaling the total amount caught off the coast, but no information as to value is available. The products prepared from fish amounted in 1911 to 1,212 tons, in 1912 to 1,068 tons, and in 1913 to 690 tons. The 1913 catch was made into the following products:

	Tons.
Fish, salted by the Russian method	79
Caviar, prepared by the Russian method	22
Fish, dry salted for the Japanese market	274
Herring fertilizer for the Japanese market	274
Fish oil for the Japanese market	38
Caviar for the Japanese market	3
Total	690

Coal was produced in 1913 to the extent of 36,000 tons, and nearly the whole of this was exported. It was taken partly by tramp steamers of various nationalities, and partly by the Russian volunteer fleet, and steamers of the Chinese Eastern Railway Co.

Furs are taken by the richer Oroks and Gilyaks early in the year to Nikolaevsk on the Amur. Reindeer, sable, fox, and marten are among the furs thus exported. There used to be an export of sealskins, but the fur seal is now rare.

The chief exports from Japanese Sakhalin are fish, timber, and coal.

Fish is the most valuable product. The quantities and values of the fish manure exported to Japan in the period 1897–1903 were as follows:

Year.	Tons.	Pounds.
1897-1901 (average)	17,624	123,924
1902	19,979	140,864
1903	28,390	192,156

In 1903 the export of herrings amounted to 188,459 kokus (1 koku=4.9 bushels), 934,756 bushels, and in 1907 reached its maximum with 234,316 kokus, the amount falling in 1914 to 205,644 kokus, of which 1,800 kokus were salted and sent to China for food. The export of salmon, which in 1903 amounted to 4,639 kokus only, rose in 1914 to 17,977 kokus. The export of trout, which amounted to 27,061 kokus in 1903, reached in 1912 a total of 127,815 kokus, which, after a decline in 1916, was succeeded in 1917 by a still larger export of 167,620 kokus. The export of crab has developed in recent years, and 5,760,000 cans were exported in 1917, chiefly to America. There is also an export of trepang and sea cabbage to China.

Timber was exported to a value of £3,522 in 1912, and of £13,155 in 1913; these figures should, however, be increased by the value of the timber reaching Hakodate via Hokkaido ports.

Almost the whole of the coal produced is exported. In 1914 the production amounted to 14,653 tons, in 1915 to 27,665, and in 1916 to 37,640.

Besides these three chief exports, match sticks, wood pulp, and probably all the charcoal, calcium acetate, and wood-tar products are exported.

(b) Imports.

No information is available as to the amount of the import trade of either part of the island. In Russian Sakhalin the local products, are so scanty that many of the necessities as well as the luxuries of life have to be imported. These include some cereals, brick, tea, rice, tobacco, clothing, hardware, and rifles. In Japanese Sakhalin, the Japanese craftsman can supply most of the native needs, but rice, tobacco, tea, and clothing have to be imported, and the fishermen need nets and gear, tins for canning, and other articles, besides salt, which is imported from Taiwan (Formosa).

(c) Customs and tariffs.

Information is wanting as to whether any customs dues are collected on imports to Sakhalin, or on goods passing from one part of the island to the other. No mention is made of them in the Japanese budget, nor in the scanty details of the Russian budget available.

(D) FINANCE.

(1) Public finance.

Until 1905 there were no taxes in Russian Sakhalin, and any taxation since imposed has been light. The treasury receipts for 1911, mostly from shop licenses, amounted to 57,426 rubles, while the expenditure for the island administration must have approached 1,000,000 rubles.

In Japanese Sakhalin, since the establishment of the special account in April, 1907, a fixed grant has been made annually by the national treasury to help toward defraying the expenses of colonization and administration; but apparently in the budget estimates for the year 1918–19 the need of this is for the first time not anticipated. The budget estimates for that year (Finance and Economic Annual of Japan, 1918, p. 192) were as follows:

REVENUE.

	Yen.
Ordinary:
Direct taxation	312,819
Revenue from public undertakings and State property	1,564,049
Licenses and fees	228,221
Stamp receipts	88,393
Miscellaneous	17,996
Profits of tobacco monopoly	144,113
Total	2,355,591
Extraordinary:
Proceeds of sale of State property	283,432
Surplus of preceding year transferred	462,815
Proceeds of loans received	1,203,100
Miscellaneous receipts	2,934
Total	1,952,281
Total revenue	4,307,872

EXPENDITURE.

Ordinary:
General administration	1,428,967
Reserve fund	80,000
Transferred from general account	41,519
Expenses for shrines	8,000
Total	1,558,486
Extraordinary:
Expenses for management of business	110,297
Building and engineering	526,218
Colonization	562,550
Special undertakings expenses	1,403,100
Expenses for taking of census	4,262
Special allowance	142,959
Total	2,749,386
Total expenditure	4,307,872

With this may be compared the budget for 1913–14, the last pre-war year, when the ordinary revenue amounted to 1,983,934 yen, and the extraordinary revenue to 687,013 yen, making a total of 2,670,947 yen. For the same year the ordinary expenditure was 1,007,665 yen and the extraordinary expenditure 1,270,381 yen, making a total of 2,278,046 yen; there was thus a surplus of 392,901 yen.

(2) Currency.

The currency in the Russian and Japanese parts of the island is the same as in the rest of the two Empires. In Russian Sakhalin, as in eastern Siberia, more silver and fewer notes were in circulation before the war than in western Russia.

In accordance with the imperial ordnance of October 29, 1917, the Japanese have issued paper notes of small denominations—50, 20, and 10 sen (100 sen=1 yen=2s. 0½d., approximate)—to supplement the usual Japanese coinage of gold, silver, nickel, and bronze pieces. The total issue of the notes to the end of August, 1918, was 65,689,000 yen.

(3) Banking.

The Hokkaido Colonial Bank, with an authorized capital of 10,000,000 yen (£1,020,833), of which 6,250,000 yen have been paid up, was established to supply capital for the colonization and exploitation of Hokkaido and Japanese Sakhalin. The bank is empowered to make long-term loans at low interest on the security of real property and short-term loans on the security of the agricultural or marine products of Hokkaido and Japanese Sakhalin. It is authorized to make loans on pledge of the shares and debentures of joint-stock companies which have for their object the colonization and exploitation of Hokkaido and Japanese Sakhalin, and to subscribe for and take up the debentures of such companies. It can also make loans without security, redeemable by annual installments, or within fixed terms, to industrial, fishery, forestry, or stock-breeding guilds, or to associations of such guilds.

(E) GENERAL REMARKS.

The population of Russian Sakhalin has steadily decreased since the time of the Russo-Japanese War. The reasons are not hard to determine. The island, owing to its long use as a penal settlement, bears an ill name; and, except to the speculative miner, its natural resources offer none of the attractions of the mainland. Agriculture will never be a serious factor in its development; the possibilities of economic expansion are greatest for timber, coal, and petroleum. Timber, however, had been cut and burned over large areas before the settlement of 1905, and facilities for transport are lacking, so that, although the world scarcity of timber may temporarily foster the development of this industry, it can scarcely prove a permanent source of prosperity. The coal industry promises greater reward for development, but it is seriously handicapped by the want of facilities for loading and by the damage caused by careless mining. These defects are especially important in view of the competition of the coal mines of Manchuria, Primorsk, and Japan. A petroleum industry is often spoken of, but it does not exist at present. The presence of petroleum in quantities large enough to make exploitation remunerative has not yet been proved. The development of the Russian territory remains, therefore, uncertain, dependent on factors which have not yet been determined.

Japanese Sakhalin has the advantage of a less severe climate, with less fog. Agriculture, therefore, has a better chance and is likely at least to provide the means of livelihood for a considerable number of peasants; and there are still better prospects for stock breeding. The timber and wood-pulp industries promise considerable development, but a careful afforestation policy is necessary. Fishing has been the staple industry in the past and may continue to be so; the island fisheries have, however, been far outstripped by those along the Siberian coast. Moreover, the great schools of fish display nervousness, and it is possible that the effect of the increasing steamer traffic may be to frighten away the fish from the waters off the island, as they have already been frightened from the coasts of Japan. The coal industry continues to grow, but the inferior quality of the product is likely to make progress slow. The possibility of developing an oil industry is even more doubtful in the southern portion of the island than in the northern. The prospects of the southern part of the island are, on the whole, good; and this is due largely to the activity of the Japanese Government in encouraging settlement and investigation and in maintaining control of the exploitation of the natural resources.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I wish to state for the record why I do not think it wise to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. I have not engaged in the discussion in reference to procedure in the ratification of the four-power pact or the supplement to it. That is a matter which comes before the Committee on Foreign Relations. Those Senators on the committee direct the procedure in the Senate, and I have no doubt they are capable of handling the situation satisfactorily to those interested. But this amendment goes right to the substance of the treaty and is material in the question of ratification, not only by us, but by the other powers.

It must be borne in mind that the purpose in writing the four-power treaty was to protect the safety of the American islands in the Pacific by arranging for a settlement of disputes in reference to them by arbitration in order to avoid war. Now, if that is not the purpose of making the four-power treaty and ratifying it, then I do not know what the purpose is. It is a purpose in a minor way to accomplish for our islands and the islands of the other three powers in the Pacific exactly what I voted for in reference to a large number of nations in the world when I voted for the ratification of the Versailles treaty. To my mind there is no distinction.

Of course, there are two sides to what shall be in and what shall be out. More than one power has to agree to these treaties. The commissioners representing the United States Government did not have the only say as to what should be done. They had to meet objections which were made by other powers, and the viewpoint of other powers had to be considered. A treaty, like a contract, is not a one-sided proposition; it is a matter of give and take.

So far as I am individually concerned, I was entirely satisfied with the four-power treaty when the home islands of Japan were embraced in it, because if I was willing to respect the rights of Japan in her insular possessions, I saw no reason why I should not be willing to respect her rights in her insular dominion, her home land, and that was the situation when the treaty was signed. Subsequently Japan indicated that she desired to have her home islands withdrawn. The treaty not having been ratified by the council of the Empire of Japan, of course she had a perfect right to say that her home islands should come out, or she would not ratify and conclude the treaty. But when she asked for the making of the supplementary treaty which is now pending before the Senate, providing for the withdrawal of her home islands, she desired to leave other islands within the terms of the treaty.

If Japan had been willing to exempt from the treaty the southern half of the island of Sakhalin, that belongs to her under a treaty of peace entered into with Russia nearly 20 years ago, the title to which is not in dispute, so far as I am individually concerned I would have been perfectly willing to leave it out.

The point of interest to me was not the Japanese islands. It was not to protect the Japanese islands that I signed this treaty or agreed to it as one of the delegates. I entered into the contract to protect the islands of the United States and to protect the people of the United States. Though others differ with me and are entitled to their opinion, yet in my judgment it is a great achievement that we have accomplished, an understanding by which the Philippine Islands are no longer a danger point on the horizon of the East.

I would have no personal objection to the exclusion of the island of Sakhalin as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas if I had the determination of it; but I have not. That is the Japanese part of the treaty. They are proposing to put the blanket of the four-power treaty over the Philippine Islands for us. They ask us to put under the blanket of the four-power treaty the islands named in the treaty, not including their homeland, but including the southern half of Sakhalin which belongs to them. I think if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, striking out the reference to the southern half of the island of Sakhalin, then in all probability, or possibility perhaps I had better say, Japan would not ratify the treaty, and if she did not ratify it then, whatever is accomplished under the four-power treaty would be gone.

Now, as to those who think that a mistake is being made in making and ratifying the four-power treaty, I can see very well why they should vote to strike out the reference to the southern half of the island of Sakhalin, because possibly then Japan may reject the treaty. But to those having my viewpoint, who believe that the four-power treaty is of value to the people and the Government of the United States, I say that I see no reason why it should be stricken out and the treaty endangered.

I listened to the argument of the Senator from Arkansas in reference to the treaty involving us in war. He referred to something said in my speech the other day. I see no danger of Russia making war upon Japan in the next 10 or 11 years, because I have not the slightest idea, and I do not think any other man who has studied history or the building of armies believes, that it is possible for Russia to recover within 10 years. I believe that within less than that time Japan will have removed her troops out of the northern half of Sakhalin and out of the main coast of Asia, and if she does there is no question for dispute.

Of course nobody can look into the future. I do not set myself up as a prophet; I can not say what is coming; but I am thoroughly convinced for two reasons that Sakhalin would not be the point of attack.

The first reason is that, if it was the point of attack, Russia would involve herself with three other nations, not in the way of attack, but the question would have to be left to an international understanding under the terms of this treaty; not as to the involvement of arms but possibly the involvement of finance, and she has no finances. She has never had them. Even in the greatest days of her Empire in modern times she was always short in finances. So for that reason, if she wanted to attack Japan at any time I think the southern half of Sakhalin would be the last point she would attack.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator's back was turned to me, and perhaps I may have misunderstood what he said. I understood him to say, and if I am in error I hope he will kindly correct me, that if Russia should in the next 10 years attack the island of Sakhalin, she would find herself involved with three other nations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator may not have heard me. I said not in war.

Mr. JOHNSON. What three other nations? That is the point of my query.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course under the four-power treaty the United States, Great Britain, and France could be called in by Japan to discuss the question involved in the attack.

Mr. JOHNSON. So that if Russia attacked she would find herself involved with the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not in war.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not necessarily, the Senator means, in war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what the Senator meant, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but in a diplomatic controversy which I said would seriously affect any chance of Russia to finance a war.

Mr. JOHNSON. And if she continued her attack she might necessarily find herself involved in war, too, might she not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think she would, so far as this country is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON. She might, might she not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Anything might happen.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what might happen under this treaty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Ten years ago I would have said that an American Army of 2,000,000 men would never land in France. I am not a prophet. I have listened to some of my friends prophesy on the floor of the Senate during the last two weeks. They may be good prophets, but I doubt it. I am not going to indulge in prophecy myself. This is a practical question and I am speaking of the practical question before the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] insists that this island would be the point of attack. I do not know where Russians would attack, but I know where they have attacked in the past. In the last two decades there have been two great wars in that immediate neighborhood between those Governments here involved.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought I made it clear that the conflicting authorities of the Russian Government and the Japanese Government would likely bring about a state of war on the island itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not imply that the possession of the island was necessarily of so much importance that a nation attacking Japan, particularly another nation than Russia, would want to seize that island first. The point I attempted to make was that in addition to its proximity to the Asiatic mainland making attack probable was the further consideration that already conflicts between what we may term Russian authority and Japanese authority occurs on the island of Sakhalin, and this is likely to ripen into a condition of threatened aggression, if indeed that does not already exist.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not understand the Senator in that way. I thought he was referring to something else.

Mr. ROBINSON. I also attempted to make the other point, that, because of its proximity to the Asiatic mainland, it was quite natural to expect an attack from Russia in the event she ever tried to expel Japan from her territory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now understand better what he said, but as I understood the Senator's argument—and I sat here very carefully to listen to it—it was that the danger point would be that if Russia attacked Japan she would make her point of attack the island of Sakhalin. I was merely calling attention to the fact that in the Chinese-Japanese war the attack was at the borderland of Korea and at Port Arthur, and in the Japanese-Russian war it was not at Sakhalin; it was not at any of the islands of the Pacific; it was not even at Vladivostok; but it was Korea and Port Arthur where the attack took place.

I may be mistaken, but I think any military man would say that should these two great countries become involved in war some day in the future—and I hope they never will; I hope that the great principles of arbitration and the settlement of disputes outside of the arbitrament of arms may come to live in the world and that war between those two great nations may never happen—and Russia should launch an attack, she would attack the northern end of Korea, because she would then not have to cross the sea, and she would strike at the most vital point of Japan. If I should care to prophesy, I should venture that prediction.

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly a well-advised military campaign is directed against vital points, and the vital points that may be successfully assailed; but the contention I make is that with Japan in possession of the southern portion of the island of Sakhalin and Russia claiming ownership of the northern portion, with Japan already exercising what appears to be sovereignty over the northern portion, a conflict between Russian authority and Japanese authority on Sakhalin is inevitable, unless Russia completely gives way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or unless Japan moves out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Japan has given her pledge in an open conference to eight nations that she will move out of Manchuria and the northern half of the island of Sakhalin just as soon as the safety of her own people and her own territory will permit.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true as to Siberia also, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the vice of the proposition from the standpoint of those who think they would protect those territories now in Japanese possession against continued aggression lies in the fact that Japan assumes to herself the sole right to determine when she can or when she shall do that. I respectfully submit that the history of her procedure in Korea and Manchuria and even in Shantung and also in Siberia does not justify the expectation that she will reach the conclusion to move out in the early future, if she ever does, and I doubt whether she ever does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, we do not know the dangers which may confront Japanese subjects on that border, although we know that a Japanese consul was murdered there and we know that there were a number of Japanese citizens killed. So far as I myself am concerned——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to continue for a moment, I hope and wish that Japan may move out at once, and I believe that she will move out of that territory at a very early date; but the Senator from Arkansas must remember that we ourselves at this time are occupying somewhat of an anomalous position in some of the islands of the Carribean Sea. A nation sometimes is slow to move, but nevertheless I believe long before Russia ever recovers Japan will be out of that territory, because Japan is a proud nation and I think will endeavor to protect her word given in open conference to eight other nations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. So long as Japan persists in her present policy in Siberia, Manchuria, Mongolia, Shantung, Korea, and Sakhalin, it is a physical impossibility to avoid conflicts. If Japan is to remain in those respective territories until harmonious relations have been established between her troops and the natives, her occupation will probably last until the end of time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is referring to national conflicts, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; but it was not a national conflict that prompted Japan to go into Korea and to take possession of the lower half of Sakhalin.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was a national conflict that took her there in the beginning, but she did not move out after she had concluded the war. That was the difficulty; she went in during the Russian war, and she did not move out; but she has pledged herself to eight nations to move out of that territory, and I believe she will not break her faith with those eight nations. The Senator from Arkansas may say I am wrong; but that is a matter of opinion. I say I am right.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator, of course, remembers the history of Korea?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that Japan gave exactly the same pledge, or even a stronger pledge, in that case; that the United States and Great Britain were committed to the execution of that pledge; that the pledge was totally disregarded; and that the last semblance of hope of Japan keeping that pledge has disappeared forever.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I remember that, and I think the incident is not creditable to my own country.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think if my own country had taken the stand which duty demanded the result would not have been the same.

Mr. ROBINSON. The history of Japan will not support the hope of the Senator from Alabama that she will speedily vacate the territories of which she is now in possession which belong to China and Russia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the present situation is entirely different from that which formerly existed. I have just called the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that Japan stayed in Korea by the consent of the great nations of the world. The Senator knows that as well as I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the United States consent to it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is my understanding that she did.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; I am not willing that my good friend, the Senator from Alabama——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not mean that the United States gave affirmative consent, but she did negatively, for she declined to move.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is not much difference between the Senator's viewpoint touching the action and attitude of the United States toward Korea and my own, but I am not willing that the Senator should put our Government in the attitude of having consented to the ravishment of Korea. What we did has never been fully disclosed, it is true; but when we consider the course that affairs took and the final and complete subjection of Korea to Japanese authority, it is indeed, in my judgment, a shameful blot on the history of all the nations concerned. But the point I am making is that it is so recent an incident in history as not to justify the hope which the Senator expresses that we will be a powerful factor in moving Japan out of China and Russia.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take altogether the opposite view. I do not see a very material difference between giving actual consent and withholding your hand and saying somebody else must act. I do not think that is a manly thing for an individual or a nation to do.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator absolutely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the Senator from Arkansas does. The great nations of the world did not stand by Korea and protect her at that time. If they had there would have probably been a different story. I am not criticizing Japan entirely, because we have taken some territory by the force of arms, and so has every other great civilized nation. I only hope that that period in the world's history has passed forever and that the subjugation of weaker nations may never again be carried out by force. That is why I stand, with all my heart, all my mind, and all the patriotism which I possess, for the four-power treaty, because I believe it is a step toward the reign of peace. I say, however, the situation in Korea and in the northern half of Sakhalin is very different from that in the marine Provinces of Siberia, if I may properly so describe them. There Japan went in, marching shoulder to shoulder with American troops, having in view the very proper purpose of helping some of our allies or some of those who desired to be our allies out of Russia. We came out; Japan did not come out with us; but she has solemnly promised not only our Government but seven other great nations of the world that she will come out.

Mr. ROBINSON. When she gets ready.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We should do Japan the justice of stating what she said. She did not say "when she got ready," but she said when her people and her territory were safeguarded against danger from red armies and aggressions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, by the way, what was our promise with regard to leaving the Philippines? It was rather conditional, was it not, when a stable government was established, and we were to be the judge of that? Does not that mean when we get ready?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. The Senator and I were right some years ago in our position as to the Philippines, as we evidenced by our votes; other people are not right even yet.

Mr. President, I did not intend to speak at any length, because the Senator from Arkansas says he desires to vote, and I think he is entitled to have a vote before he leaves. I would not have said anything on the subject except that I was one of those who signed the treaty, and I think it would be disastrous to adopt the Senator's amendment, because it might defeat the treaty. I do not care anything about the northern half of the island of Sakhalin or the southern half of it, but I do not want the four-power treaty to be defeated. Japan wants this island included in this pact, as we wanted the Philippine Islands included. That is her part of the bargain. I think if we vote now to strike it out we may endanger the treaty, and therefore we ought to vote down the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama takes his seat I should like to inquire, suppose that the Parliament of Japan should amend the treaty by striking out the Philippine Islands, what would happen then?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We would not exchange ratifications.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama why he regards it as so important now to exclude the mainland of Japan when he signed and urged the Senate to ratify a treaty which embraced it, and signed with knowledge that the mainland of Japan was included in the treaty?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator was not listening to me when I said the first words of my recent remarks. I said that I had no objection in the beginning to the mainland of Japan being in, that I have not any objection now, and that I signed the supplemental treaty not because I wanted the mainland of Japan out but because Japan said she wanted it out; that when I was ready to respect the rights of Japan to her insular possessions I stood equally ready to respect her rights in her insular dominions, which are her homeland; and that never for a moment has there been any desire on my part, so far as I am individually concerned, to exclude the homeland of Japan except that Japan asked to have it done, and equally I have no desire——

Mr. ROBINSON. In other words, the Senator stands ready to do whatever Japan wants done regarding the matter—either to include the mainland or to exclude it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is not fair about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is not that true?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; as to Japan's own possessions, but not as to anything that affects us; not as it affects us.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator ought to be a little more sparing of his use of the words "fair" and "unfair." I think the Senator must know that if any conclusion is deducible from his statement, it is that he was willing to include the mainland of Japan, and he was willing to and did include it in the four-power treaty, and Japan objected, and he was willing to take it out because Japan objected. I think my conclusion is justifiable that he was willing that Japan should have the mainland either included or excluded, that she should have whatever she desired in connection with it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator did not say, before, "in connection with Japan's own islands." That is the only objection I have to his statement. In his original statement he did not say that I was willing for Japan to do what she desired in reference to her own islands. When it came down to our islands, at one time it was suggested that the naval treaty should go so far as to include the islands of Hawaii. I very seriously objected when I heard that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What islands?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Hawaiian Islands, which are excluded from the naval treaty. I very seriously objected, because I wanted the fortifications in Hawaii to continue, and they will be continued. That was in reference to the fortifications in the naval treaty, not in reference to this treaty; but as to whether Japan has one island in here or a dozen islands in here makes no difference with me. What I am interested in is that the Philippine Islands should be in this treaty and that we should have the protection of an understanding instead of the protection of a battleship.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to indulge in any post-mortem in reference to the treaty which has just been ratified by the Senate. I recognize how very unprofitable it is to indulge in any retrospect regarding that treaty, or to attempt now to corroborate or confirm anything that may have been said upon the one side or the other; but I can not refrain, in passing, from suggesting to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that the position he has just taken is exactly the position which was taken by those who opposed that treaty. He is eternally right when he says that the purpose of the four-power treaty was to protect the American islands in the Pacific, and that there is no distinction between the purpose here and the purpose of the Versailles treaty. He is right because the obligation that we had under the Versailles treaty—by that he means the League of Nations, of course—is exactly the obligation which we have under the four-power pact. That was the position of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] before the Foreign Relations Committee. I am very glad, indeed, that finally it appears to be the position taken upon this floor by the proponents of the treaty.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator makes very plain his attitude, too—an attitude not dissimilar from that that we took upon this floor a week ago when we were protesting against the ratification of the treaty. He said that if within the next 10 years there should be an attack by Russia upon the island of Sakhalin, Russia would find herself involved with three other nations besides Japan; and when asked what nations Russia would find herself involved with in case she attacked Sakhalin, the Senator from Alabama said she would find herself involved with Great Britain, with France, and with the United States of America. He added, not necessarily in war, and in that he is entirely correct. She would be involved not necessarily in war, Mr. President, but possibly in war; and when that is the construction put upon the treaty by one of the writers of the treaty, we may say to the people of the United States finally that there is no longer a question about what the four-power treaty is intended to do and what actually it does do, for we have now not the mere ipse dixit of Senators who oppose the treaty; we have now the learned view and the dispassionate judicial utterance of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, who was one of the writers or one of the progenitors of the treaty.

Mr. President, it was my purpose to speak for just a moment or two upon the question which has been agitating the Senate for the last two days concerning the matter of ratification. I confess a very great perplexity in that matter. I do not understand, and I admit it very readily, why it was that a treaty came to us with two distinct parts, and one part alone apparently was acted upon. I do not propose to enter into any technical analysis of whether a ratification of a part might constitute a ratification of the whole. That seems to me something in which it is unnecessary at this time to indulge. The problem presenting itself to me is whether we ought not to be sure, if the matter contained in the reservations is important, that that matter shall be passed upon by the Senate of the United States, part of the treaty-making power. If there is any doubt or any uncertainty concerning the matter, if it rests now in speculation and is a matter for technical argument, that ought to be done which is essential to be done to make the matter wholly certain.

I admit that I am not wholly certain as to why the particular reservation concerning domestic questions was written into a separate document at all. I can not quite see, I confess, how domestic questions could be involved in the terms of the treaty; but evidently it was supposed that they were in some fashion involved, that it was necessary to make the matter very plain and it was essential to remove some ambiguity, and the reservation was adopted by the American delegates and the other representatives and was presented to the Senate by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, this matter of domestic questions is one of extraordinary importance to the territory from which I come. I have refrained since I have been here from discussing the Japanese question in relation to California except in incidental fashion; and while others have spoken upon that subject, and sometimes their words have been imputed and attributed to me, it is a fact, sir, that while I have been here I have said but little of that character. I do not propose at this particular moment to indulge in any extended remarks concerning the problems which are real problems upon the Pacific coast and which have led to more or less diplomatic correspondence and perhaps more or less friction with the Empire of Japan. Suffice it to say, sir, that there are involved three distinct important problems. The first relates to the endeavor on the part of various Western States to protect their agricultural land. The second relates to the prevention of Japanese immigration. The third to citizenship of Japanese. We tried to prevent immigration by notes exchanged by the two Governments, and the vice of that kind of treaty making was never better demonstrated, sir, than by the inefficiency of the notes exchanged between the Governments relating to Japanese immigration; and you have but to compare the effect of the Chinese exclusion law on the one hand—an act of Congress—with an agreement entered into that diplomatically is termed a "gentlemen's agreement," on the other hand, to see the utter failure of the one and the efficacy of the other.

Mr. President, these problems are very, very grave problems upon the Pacific coast, and not only upon the Pacific coast at present but in other States that are contiguous to the Pacific coast. Indeed, the problem has traveled far back now into some States of the Middle West. It is now no longer local. It is national. If there be any doubt whatever as to whether or not these questions which are domestic in character may come under the treaty that has just been ratified, a course should be pursued by the Senate and by those in charge of this treaty that will make the matter plain beyond the peradventure of a doubt. No self-respecting nation, of course, can submit its domestic problems to any other nations at all. It is an impossibility in the very nature of nationality that one country should submit its domestic questions to another for decision, or to any number of others for decision.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If there had been no declaration by the delegates or the commissioners to the late conference, if there had been no supplemental treaty, if there had been nothing before the Senate except the original four-power treaty, which in its terms related to the rights of the contracting parties in their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific, would the Senator contend for a minute that any question involving the lands of California or immigration into California was raised in that pact?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have already said that I was unable to see the reason for the insertion of the particular reservation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was listening to the Senator, but our minds do not always keep the channel, and what he said escaped me. I beg his pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON. In the beginning of my remarks I said that I was unable to observe the absolute necessity for any such reservation, but somebody deemed it necessary; and then there is another thing I know, Mr. President, with which perhaps the Senator from Alabama is not quite so familiar. I know the peculiar ingenuity of the people with whom we are dealing, and I know how it is possible for them, by a process of logic we can seldom follow, to bring one sort of conclusion from a premise from which both of us may start—a conclusion utterly different from that which we could reach by any logical processes. I know that that is the way in which they deal, and that it is sometimes an impossibility to know from the spoken words what may be ultimately in the minds of those who speak those words.

Mr. President, we have here a treaty which our friends on this side who advocate it say is a mere treaty of consultation. I eliminate from that class of advocates the distinguished Senator from Alabama, because he has made very plain to-day his view of this treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will not leave any misunderstanding in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was eliminating the Senator from Alabama. Does he want to be included?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator referred to the question of war——

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator want to be included among the advocates referred to?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want it distinctly understood that I do not claim there is anything in this treaty which relates to war, but there is the power, the great power, of the moral influence of four great nations behind this, which will control.

As a matter of fact, if the Senator will pardon me just for a minute, nations which go to war must have supplies, they must have fuel, and they must have money. The moral influence of these four great nations, without drawing a sword or firing a gun, will be such that it will prevent war and maintain peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator mean they will prevent war by refusing supplies, by refusing money, by boycotting them, and the like?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe——

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator not answer that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe in it for peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course we believe in peace. It is a beautiful and a sacred name.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I heard the Senator express the same viewpoint——

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what the Senator is treating of now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the debates which occurred here a year or two ago.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the Senator if he will not answer, does he not believe that under this treaty we have the right to withhold supplies and money, that we may boycott, that we may put economic pressure on, and the like?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that under this treaty, of course, and outside of this treaty——

Mr. JOHNSON. I am speaking of what we can do under the treaty now, not what we can do outside. We could do lots of things outside.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Within the treaty and outside of it——

Mr. JOHNSON. We may do those things?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We can refuse, and we ought to refuse, to lend credit to a nation to go to war.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We can refuse, and ought to refuse, to lend supplies to a nation to go to war.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I should be very glad, when I thought the cause was right, to advocate that my Government should take that position in order to maintain peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the distinguished Senator this: Under the treaty do we say that we can agree to do those things in concert with our allies?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. The treaty says—and I do not say it says any more or less, just as the Senator knows—that these powers shall meet to consult as to what shall be done, and they can consult and then go home and do what each individual of them wants. If it were to prevent the bringing on of a war, I should be very glad to back up any effort of the commissioners representing the United States Government by withholding credit and supplies in order to maintain peace.

Mr. JOHNSON. And economically boycotting?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. You may call it an economic boycott, but an economic boycott to maintain the peace of the world in my humble judgment would be greatly approved.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not questioning how good or how bad it would be, but, of course, if under this treaty you can indulge, by virtue of your compact, in an economic boycott, under this treaty you can indulge, too, in force. That seems to me to be as plain as that night follows day. But now that the discussion is over, will the Senator from Alabama take it amiss if I ask a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will be glad to answer if I can.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would not ask the Senator during the time of the debate, but I have been told by three of his colleagues that he considered this treaty to be substantially article 10 of the league, and that there was force behind it. Was that inaccurate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Usually things grow as they get farther away from us.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is likely. I did not ask the Senator the question during the debate, but I do not think it is inappropriate now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I never contended that there was force behind article 10 of the League of Nations. There may have been Senators who took the same position I did, but I refused to vote for reservations as to article 10. Article 10 of the League of Nations' covenant proposed that the signatory powers to that agreement should respect each other's rights, and I say there is no compact of peace which can be made which has not as its initial step an agreement to respect each other's rights.

Mr. JOHNSON. Ah, but article 10 provides more than that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the substance of article 10.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no; there is more than that in article 10.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It provides for respecting and preserving, undoubtedly.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a great deal of difference between respecting and preserving.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator need not indict me on that question. I disagreed with him and many men on his side.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is true, and the Senator from Alabama has been reinforced by many men on this side in his present view. I grant that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I supported the League of Nations because I believed in it. I have not changed my viewpoint.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not question that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not prepared to take back any of my support now, and I am not standing for this treaty because it has any force in it. I think every man who sits at the table would be free to use his own judgment. Under the League of Nations every Government that sat at the table would be bound by certain restrictions agreed to in the League of Nations. That is not so here; but because it is not is no reason why I should not support this proposal when it is a step looking to peace, and an agreement, just as was true in the case of the League of Nations, and the vital thing in the League of Nations—that we would respect other people's rights. If you are not prepared to respect other people's rights, then you might as well draw your sword and bring on your guns for action tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why? Has there ever been a time in the history of this country, Mr. President, when we have not respected other people's rights? Is it conceivable that this democracy, in all the years that it may exist, if it continues from now for a thousand years, will fail to respect other people's rights?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator; but why should we not invite other people also to respect our rights?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator think that by inviting other people to respect our rights thereby we would accomplish more than by not agreeing to respect rights when all nations assume to respect rights?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I heard it stated in debate the other day, as a doctrine of international law, that nations agree to respect each other's rights; but, so far as I am concerned, I have never found it in international law. I would like to see the gentlemen who make that statement find me the place in international law where there is any such determination. But I do say that when 4 nations, or 10 nations, or 27 nations enter into a solemn compact to respect each other's rights there is some greater binding force to it, and it is more for the benefit of the world than when you simply sit down and say, "We will respect each other's rights as long as we want to."

Mr. JOHNSON. I might follow the Senator from Alabama, whom I would be delighted to follow ordinarily, even in what he last said. I have not any objection to agreeing to respect other nations' rights, or having other nations agree with us to respect all nations' rights, but I am not ready to maintain the territorial integrity of all the nations on the face of the earth, or other nations like Great Britain and Japan, and that is a very different proposition from agreeing to respect rights. I am not ready either to enter into a pact in respect to aggression by which with other nations the most efficient means of meeting the aggression shall be determined, because I know and the Senator from Alabama knows and there is not a man who has studied this pact but knows that when you determine the most efficient means to meet the aggression there will come a time, whether it be in one fashion or another, when you will be called upon to execute those means, and then there will be no other way you can pursue the course of national honor except to execute those means.

The Senator gets away from the two propositions which he made very, very plain, one that the purpose of this pact was the purpose involved in the League of Nations. I do not disagree with the Senator from Alabama on that at all. I quite agree with him. The difficulty is that I do not agree with my colleagues. The Senator from Alabama is in agreement now with them, but I am not. I agree with him that the covenant of the league and the obligations we assumed under the League of Nations are substantially those which we assume under the four-power pact. I agree with the Senator from Mississippi when he says that when you undertake to respect and maintain territorial integrity, of course you have to go to the rational conclusion, if the occasion arise, and keep your word, no matter what the consequences, when occasion may demand that you act.

I am sorry to be reiterating, but the course of the debate may have made it necessary, and I repeat that the Senator is eternally right when he says that if Russia shall within the next 10 years attack the island of Sakhalin she will be involved with four nations—with France, with Japan, with Great Britain, and with the United States of America.

Oh, he says, she will be involved in a lack of money, because we will not lend it; in lack of supplies, because we will not sell her supplies; in an economic boycott, for we may then boycott her if she engages in any aggression upon the island of Sakhalin.

All that may be so, but though that may be so under the four-power pact, it may be so, too, that we are involved with the other three nations in contributing our force to see that that aggression is met, and that the most efficient means are given in order that the aggression may be met.

It is just because of that, and because I realize and because I think the Senator from Arkansas realizes that that is possibly the point of attack in the next few years, that the amendment presented by the Senator from Arkansas ought to be adopted, and that I am for that amendment.

I do not want to have us involved in an economic boycott under this treaty, nor in the use of force under this treaty, either one. When Senators upon our side say that this is a mere treaty for consultation, is it not obvious how far and how wide is their view from that which has been expressed by the Senator from Alabama?

But to return to the question to which I was adverting. Domestic questions, of course, can not be submitted for determination by other nations, whatever their number may be. Domestic questions, if they may be involved in this treaty, of course, ought to be excepted from it, and I quite approve the caution of those who wrote the treaty, because they doubtless feared that domestic questions might be involved in it, as is shown by their writing a reservation excluding domestic questions.

I called attention to the very grave questions which now have been agitating the Pacific coast and the Empire of Japan for some time. Let me call attention to this, Mr. President, that here is a treaty for consultation alone, say some of its proponents. If it were for mere consultation between nations, if it involved only the writing of a diplomatic note, if it meant solely that there should be communications between nations, there could not be any reason for not permitting a domestic question that had caused friction between nations to be thus written about or consulted concerning. Indeed, sir, for a period of some years past there has been a matter of interchange of notes upon the Japanese question, as it was involved upon the Pacific coast, between our diplomats on the one side and the Japanese diplomats on the other. For a period of some months Mr. Morris, who represented the United States in Japan, and Baron Shidehara, the Japanese ambassador here, were engaged in many meetings for the purpose of seeing whether they could arrive at some conclusion which could be reported to their respective Governments.

I happen to be familiar with what occurred under the previous administration. I claim no familiarity with what has since transpired; but I happen to know that after months of negotiation Mr. Morris and Baron Shidehara united in a report, a report wholly unsatisfactory to the people whom I represent, but a report that is on file now in the State Department concerning the matters which had occurred between the Japanese Empire on the one hand and the United States on the other, arising out of the alien land laws of this country, and arising out of the question of Japanese immigration. They were consulting for months and months and months and months. They were writing letters, communicating with each other, holding consultations, for months and months; but so careful are our friends, in a treaty that they claim means mere consultation, that they write into this treaty a reservation that they will not permit the writing of a letter or any communication between the parties or a consultation of any kind concerning a question that they had been writing about, communicating, concerning, and consulting about for months and months in the past. It is perfectly obvious why. They know this is no treaty of consultation only. They are right. I am very glad that our representatives declined to have domestic questions included in the treaty, and they took the precaution, when it might not have been necessary, of removing them entirely from the realm of doubt and ambiguity. They are right, entirely right, and when they did it they knew that the treaty was not a mere treaty of consultation at all.

They knew it just as I know it; just as you, sir, know it; just as the American people ought to know it. With the American people knowing it, it is their right to go into the treaty; it is the right of our friends to take them into the treaty. I do not question that at all. I am questioning no man's views in any respect so far as the treaty be concerned. But to-day's developments from the Senator from Alabama I think make very, very plain just exactly what we have contended for in the past and what has sometimes been denied, and what I assert is the fact now, that there is little or no difference between the Senator from Alabama's construction of this treaty on the one hand representing the treaty and my construction opposing it upon the other. Instead of a weak and impotent contract for conference it is in reality a powerful pact under which all nations not party to it may be controlled and coerced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ASHURST. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum, as there are Senators in the Office Building who should be given an opportunity to return to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	Nelson	Sterling
Borah	Hale	New	Sutherland
Broussard	Harris	Oddie	Swanson
Bursum	Harrison	Overman	Townsend
Cameron	Hitchcock	Owen	Trammell
Capper	Johnson	Page	Underwood
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Wadsworth
Colt	Kellogg	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Keyes	Poindexter	Warren
Dial	King	Rawson	Watson, Ga.
Edge	Lenroot	Robinson	Weller
Ernst	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Fernald	McCormick	Shortridge	Willis
Fletcher	McNary	Simmons
France	Moses	Spencer
Gerry	Myers	Stanley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. On this question I am privileged to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I am informed that he would vote as I am about to vote on this proposition. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I am informed that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably detained on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—20.

Ashurst	Glass	King	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	La Follette	Simmons
Caraway	Harrison	Overman	Stanley
France	Hitchcock	Pittman	Swanson
Gerry	Johnson	Robinson	Watson, Ga.

NAYS—53.

Ball	Fletcher	Myers	Sutherland
Broussard	Frelinghuysen	Nelson	Townsend
Bursum	Gooding	New	Trammell
Calder	Hale	Oddie	Underwood
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Wadsworth
Capper	Kellogg	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Colt	Keyes	Phipps	Warren
Cummins	Lenroot	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Curtis	Lodge	Pomerene	Weller
Dial	McCormick	Rawson	Williams
Dillingham	McCumber	Shortridge	Willis
Edge	McLean	Smoot
Ernst	McNary	Spencer
Fernald	Moses	Sterling

NOT VOTING—23.

Brandegee	Heflin	Newberry	Reed
Crow	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Shields
Culberson	Kendrick	Norbeck	Smith
du Pont	Ladd	Norris	Stanfield
Elkins	McKellar	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Harreld	McKinley	Ransdell

So Mr. ROBINSON'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, what stage in the consideration of the treaty have we reached?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the treaty will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I offer the reservation which I send to the desk to be added to the ratifying resolution of the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution of ratification as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations a comma and the following words:

subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification, and which repeats the declaration of intent and understanding made by the representatives of the powers signatories of the four-power treaty relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean:

1. That the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.

2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 of the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the reservation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offered a reservation to the four-power treaty the other day dealing with the same question which is involved in paragraph 2 of the reservation now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, the question of excluding our domestic affairs from consideration of the four-power conference. The reservation which I offered at that time was the same reservation which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts and which was adopted by the Senate as a part of the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty at the time that treaty was under consideration before this body. The covenant of the League of Nations contained a provision attempting, just as the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts undoubtedly attempts, to exclude consideration of domestic affairs or domestic questions. At the time the covenant of the League of Nations was under consideration in connection with the Versailles treaty the Senator from Massachusetts and a majority of the Senate evidently did not consider that the clause contained in the covenant of the League of Nations was sufficiently definite to protect our interests.

It was then stated that matters which were recognized in international law as involving the domestic affairs of one of the countries could not be considered by the council of the League of Nations. That question was debated quite extensively in this body; but out of an abundance of caution, we were informed at that time by the proponents of the reservation, it was decided that we should not trust to a future interpretation as to what constituted domestic affairs in international law. It was then called to our attention that a great many controversies had arisen over the very question as to what constituted the principles of international law with regard to certain matters. It was then considered so important that we should not permit any other nation or group of nations or even all of the nations of the world in the League of Nations to interfere in any way, even by considering a question that might involve our own private domestic affairs, that the Senator from Massachusetts, with his accustomed acumen and precaution, very carefully drafted a reservation which was to become a part of the covenant of the League of Nations. He advocated it on the floor of the Senate, and he was supported by nearly all of the Senators on the other side; indeed, I believe by all of them. That reservation was adopted as a part of the resolution of ratification of the Versailles treaty, which embraced the covenant of the League of Nations.

Now I desire to offer that same reservation as an addition to that portion of the reservation already offered by the Senator which is embraced in paragraph 2 of his reservation. I offer it out of the same abundance of caution which moved the Senator from Massachusetts and those on his side of the Chamber, and as now suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]—and I mean it—I am moved by the same patriotic motive which undoubtedly moved the Senator from Massachusetts at that time.

I offer that reservation as an amendment to follow paragraph 2 of the reservation which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered in the nature of an interpretation of what it means; at least, as our interpretation of what it means.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say for the benefit of Senators who may not have been here when it was read, that the reservation which I have offered is simply, word for word, the declaration signed by all the representatives of the nations signatory to the four-power treaty. I trust it will not be changed.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in order that there may be no mistake about the reservation which we are discussing, I desire to say the reservation which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered is the one which was drafted not by that Senator but by the representatives of the four powers who were here in Washington. That is the reservation which the Senator from Massachusetts offers now.

Mr. LODGE. That is the one I offer.

Mr. PITTMAN. The reservation I have offered and to which I have called the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts is the one for which he was personally responsible at the time we were considering the Versailles treaty and the League of Nations.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada will be voted down. I am quite ready to vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, while the Senator is on his feet may I inquire if the reservation which he has offered relates to the declaration which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] brought to the attention of the Senate on Friday last, just before the resolution of ratification was voted on, at which time the Senator from Massachusetts called for the regular order?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it was ruled out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the Senator from Massachusetts said it was no part of the treaty, that it should not be offered, and prevented us from taking a vote on it. Is that the same matter that is now offered?

Mr. LODGE. I did call for the regular order, and it was ruled out of order at that time, of course.

Mr. HARRISON. It was ruled out of order at that time?

Mr. LODGE. It was.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Under the rules of the Senate, of course.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that the reason why the Senator objected to it at that time?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Or was it because he did not think it was a part of the treaty at that time?

Mr. LODGE. I did not think it was then a part of the treaty.

Mr. HARRISON. And the Senator has changed his mind about that?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not think it is a part of the treaty now; but I think it is a wise thing to put it in, so that there may be no doubt in the minds of Senators on the other side, who seemed to think it was of no value unless it was ratified in some form.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in order that I may understand the record as it now is presented to us, I should like to ask a question. As I understand the Senator from Massachusetts is offering to the supplementary treaty the declaration which was embodied in the four-power treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask that the amendment to the reservation may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the reservation will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Nevada offers to amend the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts by adding at the end thereof the following:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the identity not only of purpose but of very language of the reservation which it is intended by this amendment to make more specific and the language of the provision of the covenant of the League of Nations, to which a like reservation was attached.

The reservation before us, being in substance the agreement supplementary to the four-power pact, reads:

That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Note the language—

Within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

The covenant of the League of Nations on that point reads as follows:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report.

In other words, Mr. President, in framing the supplementary agreement which is reproduced in the reservation now before us, the framers went to the covenant of the League of Nations and not only adopted the idea there expressed but adopted the very language there expressed—that is to say, questions "solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of the parties.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, there is one important difference, and that is that under the League of Nations there was a reference to the council.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; there was a reference for adjustment to the council, and in this case there is a reference to representatives of the four powers interested. That is the essential difference between the two; but the point is that the Senator from Massachusetts insisted that some power other than the United States represented upon the council of the League of Nations would insist, for instance, that the subject of immigration was not a domestic question, but was an international question, and that therefore the subject of immigration from the oriental countries to this country might become a matter for adjudication before the council.

It was stoutly contended that it had been determined over and over again by the Supreme Court of the United States, the opinion having been produced here in the course of the debate, that such a question was domestic in its character and was not an international question, as well as that it had been treated as a domestic question in practically all international conferences; but argument of that character did not prevail at all. It was considered so doubtful, it was considered so necessary to assure the people of the Pacific coast that the subject of oriental immigration should not be a matter for consideration by the council, lest it should hold it was an international question that it was deemed advisable by the Senator from Massachusetts to safeguard the thing by offering thereto the reservation which is now tendered by the Senator from Nevada as an amendment to the reservation, namely:

The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating wholly or in part to its internal affairs, including immigration, labor, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, the suppression of traffic in women and children, and in opium and other dangerous drugs, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty to be submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the League of Nations or any agency thereof, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

It will be remembered that it was widely circulated through the United States by those who were antagonistic to the League of Nations—I would not undertake to say that the Senator from Massachusetts was in any way responsible for it—that the council would pass upon the question as to whether traffic in women and children might go on unrestricted, and so forth; and in order to protect us against that peril, this was likewise included in the reservation then offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I am going to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I indulge in these comments simply for the purpose of enabling the country to take a more accurate measurement of the motives which impelled the making of the reservation in question to the covenant of the League of Nations and others of like character that were entered at that time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before I vote upon this matter I desire to say a word.

The second part of this reservation reads:

That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 of the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which according to principles of international law lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Who will decide whether or not a question is one which under principles of international law lies wholly within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers?

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator ask me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am asking for information.

Mr. LODGE. Each one of the powers, of course, because it has to be unanimous.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed. So, as a matter of fact, it must be said that this reservation really has no effect at all, because we will decide it for ourselves with the reservation, and we would decide it for ourselves under the four-power treaty without the reservation.

Mr. LODGE. It will do no harm.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose so.

Mr. LODGE. I do not follow the Senator's logic; but it does no harm.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see why my logic is not good. It is a domestic question; therefore this Government decides it for itself. It always will decide it for itself. It would decide it for itself if it were in the four-power treaty without this reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; that is my belief.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; exactly.

Mr. LODGE. But I think it is desirable, on account of the debate that has gone on here, to settle that doubt.

Mr. BORAH. But the trouble is that we assume that a debate here and a construction here will settle something in the future. Of course, if they ever read the debates, they would not be bound by them.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator think there is this distinction: I agree with the Senator that the final result is the same; but without the reservation it might be claimed that they would take jurisdiction for the purpose of consideration, although there could be no conclusion or agreement unless we assented, while with the reservation the question of jurisdiction could be raised, and if either party should claim that it was not a proper subject of consideration under international law that would end the controversy?

Mr. BORAH. That would be true without the reservation, because if they should raise the question and the United States should say, "This is a domestic question," that would be the end of it.

Mr. LENROOT. That would be the end of it so far as concerned the United States announcing beforehand that it would not agree to any conclusion with respect to it.

Mr. BORAH. I am willing to vote for it, Mr. President, just as I voted for a great many other reservations—because it can do no harm, and it could not make the treaty worse than it is.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I want to say just a word with reference to the claim by some Senators across the aisle that Senators are inconsistent in voting against the reservation proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is entirely consistant in the position he takes, that he will vote against this amendment to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I think every Senator must appreciate the distinction between the provision in the Versailles treaty for the submission of questions, excluding domestic questions, and the submission under the four-power treaty. The Senator who offers this reservation voted against the similar reservation, as I recollect, under the Versailles treaty, when under the Versailles treaty it was proposed to submit the question of jurisdiction of the council to the council, where the United States did not participate and had no vote if it was a party to the dispute. Therefore under the Versailles treaty it was proposed, without the reservation that was adopted by the Senate, to let foreign nations determine for the United States, if they agreed unanimously, that a question that we insisted was a domestic question was in fact an international question. So the reservation became highly necessary under the Versailles treaty; whereas under the four-power treaty, as the Senator from Idaho has well pointed out, there must be a unanimous conclusion, and the fact is that under the four-power treaty if either party claims that the question is one of domestic jurisdiction and not international, that is the end of that question so far as any conference is concerned.

Just one word with reference to the statement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that the Senator from Nebraska on last Friday offered this same proposition, and that it was excluded upon a point of order as not being a part of the treaty. The Senator from Nebraska did not call attention to this provision at all until that treaty had gotten beyond the stage of amendment and reservation under the rules of the Senate, and therefore no amendment or reservation was in order under the rules of the Senate at the time that the Senator from Nebraska called attention to it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will answer first the last part of the Senator's remarks.

At the time that the Senator from Nebraska called attention to his reservation and tried to have it read, the Senator from Massachusetts raised the point of order and would not allow it to be read from the desk. Not only that, but at the time that the Senator called attention to it, the Senator from Wisconsin could not have been very ignorant about the situation then, and at that time the resolution of ratification had not been adopted. At that time the Brandegee reservation had not been adopted, and the Senator can not claim the excuse that he did not know anything about it, because he had heard about it before we adopted the Brandegee reservation. He sat here and voted against amendment after amendment to the Brandegee reservation time and time again.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. PITTMAN. And yet he did not offer any reservation as he is now offering to-day.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I was not speaking of the Senator's amendment with reference to what I said about the Senator from Mississippi. I was speaking about his statement that the Senator from Nebraska offered the declaration which the Senator from Massachusetts now offers, and which he said was excluded upon a point of order, which was not true. Of course, the Senator from Nevada did offer his reservation, and, as I recollect, it was voted down.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not talking about the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I say that the Senator from Nebraska, as I believe the RECORD will disclose, called this matter to the attention of the Senate before there was a final vote on the resolution of ratification.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; but after it had gotten beyond the stage of amendment under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Amendments could be offered to the reservation, however.

Mr. LENROOT. No; not under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly. In fact, numbers of them were offered to the amendment after the statement by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. If he will examine the RECORD, he will find that there was not one.

Mr. PITTMAN. That, however, is not what I wished to say.

Mr. President, in my mind fundamentally there is a great difference between the four-power pact and the League of Nations. I am not going to argue that; it is an endless subject, as I know; but I do not think this country was in any such danger of being discriminated against by a body that embraced as many nations as that did as it is in danger of being discriminated against in this particular four-power pact.

Here is Japan, for instance, who bases her cause of complaint against the United States entirely on these very domestic questions. She is one of the four powers that will decide what is a domestic question under international law. There is Great Britain, which is chiefly interested in not having to go to the defense of Japan. She is not interested in our domestic affairs. France is in the same position. They have concocted this scheme for the purpose, as they say, of preventing war, and yet they know that the only chance of war between any of the four powers in the Pacific is one between Japan and the United States, and they know that the possible causes of such a war are all domestic. We are deliberately entering into a four-power pact, when the only cause of war we know of now between any of the powers will arise out of questions solely concerning our domestic affairs, and yet we slur over these provisions affecting such questions. We know that immigration, the right of citizenship for Japanese subjects, and the right to own land in this country are the causes, if there are any causes, which threaten war between Japan and the United States. Yet we are willing to leave the determination of such questions in doubt. We are afraid now to say what we think. We are going to wait until the question is raised in a conference of those powers, and when it is raised the Senator from Wisconsin will say, "Well, we are not going to permit that question to be considered." They would have a right to say, "That was called to your attention when you were ratifying these treaties, and why did you not say specifically then that you were not going to permit these particular questions to be considered? You left it to be determined subsequently as to what constitutes domestic questions in international law. You did not say, 'We alone will decide what questions under international law are our domestic affairs,'" and by refusing to so say that, you leave it to the conference of the four powers to decide.

When you had a chance to state definitely that the United States alone would determine this question, and voted it down, you could not later object to a full consideration of such question by the four powers, and probably by three votes to your one they would determine whether or not certain questions were domestic questions under international law.

There is no comparison between the obvious danger of misunderstandings under this four-power pact and misunderstandings under a league of nations in which there are a great many neutral nations, disinterested nations, nations which have never sought other people's territory, nations whose whole course has been fair and honorable and high.

I can not understand why the Senators on the other side who thought this was so essential when the question was to be determined by practically all the civilized countries of the world are now so careless and negligent that they will not take this opportunity, when the question is raised, of telling Japan once and for all, "This question is settled. There is no use of you keeping up your anger against the United States because of her passing laws against your subjects becoming citizens of the United States. We will never agree to it, no matter how many powers join you."

We might just as well now tell Japan that if the States of this Union see fit to prevent Japanese subjects from owning real property in those States, they have a right to do it, and this Federal Government does not intend to interfere with it, by treaty or in any other way, and in fact that we are going to sustain those States in such acts if they think their social conditions require it.

We might just as well tell Japan now that if the people of the States want to separate their children in the public schools from the Japanese, this Federal Government is not going to interfere with them, by treaty or in any other way, but that it is going to sustain those States.

That is the way to stop the causes of war between the United States and Japan. Japan has never threatened Canada or Australia by reason of similar acts. It is constantly threatening the United States because of the pusillanimous conduct of the administrators of the Federal Government. You have an opportunity now to end the trouble, and if you end it now forcefully and strongly, you will not hear any more about it; but if you do not, if, after considering this question as it has been considered for days; after trying to slip it out of the treaty, as was attempted the other day; after voting down a reservation on Saturday of similar import to that I have offered to-day, you vote it down, you will lend every encouragement to the Japanese Government and the Japanese people to keep up this futile quarrel which threatens war if there is anything on earth which does threaten war.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just one word. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] questioned the accuracy of my statement that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] did not call attention to this declaration until after the treaty had passed beyond the stage of amendment. On page 4496 of the RECORD it appears that the Senator from Nebraska did not call attention to this declaration until the treaty had passed beyond the stage of amendment or reservation, and the question before the Senate was the adoption of the resolution of ratification.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the statement just made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] implies that the Senators in charge of this treaty did not know of the existence of this declaration while the treaty was passing through the amendatory stage. It implies that notwithstanding the fact that when the President sent the four-power treaty to the Senate that treaty was accompanied by a declaration explanatory of it and was printed with it as if it were a part of it.

In the very first speech made in opposition to the treaty I had the honor to point out that for some unaccountable reason an explanatory declaration made at the time or prior to the time the treaty itself was signed had not been incorporated in the body of the treaty. At that time no Senator here was of the opinion that the Senate was not to be permitted to pass upon the explanatory declaration and either advise and consent to its ratification or refuse to do so.

When the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] pointed out the fact that the declaration had not been read in the Senate, and that the Senate had not passed upon it, if the matter had taken that course by oversight; if it had been true that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] either did not know of the existence of the declaration or had overlooked its existence; if it had been true that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had forgotten about it and failed to present it to the Senate for that reason, not the slightest difficulty would have been encountered, under the rules of the Senate, in taking such action as would have enabled either the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Massachusetts to present the declaration to the Senate and have it voted upon. The fact is that for some reason, unexplained and unascertainable, it was the policy of the Senator from Massachusetts not to have the declaration passed upon by the Senate at that time.

Are we children that we should listen with great consideration to the statement that the explanatory declaration now offered to the supplementary treaty by the Senator from Massachusetts as a reservation was not considered in connection with the four-power treaty because the Senator from Massachusetts and those associated with him, in presenting the treaty to the Senate, had overlooked the necessity for presenting it? They were of the opinion then that it was not a part of the treaty and that the Senate should not have the opportunity of passing upon it. No other conclusion can be justified in the mind of anyone familiar with the procedure the Senate has followed during the consideration of the four-power treaty.

Overnight the Senator from Massachusetts has reversed himself. He has decided that the declaration should be given the status of a treaty and should be incorporated in the supplementary agreement. If it had been incorporated in the four-power treaty Japan, in ratifying the same, would of necessity ratify the interpretation of that treaty carried in the declaration. If she elects to do so, she will be at liberty, under the decision the Senate is now taking, to ratify the four-power treaty and reject the declaration incorporated in the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. This would be accomplished by Japan rejecting the supplemental treaty.

For some reason the Washington conference dealt with the real controversies between the United States and Japan with great reserve. It did not seek to work out to a final conclusion the one controversy which has imperiled the harmonious accord between this Nation and the Japanese Empire. It may have been impossible to find a solution for that question, but if the question remains to harass in the future as it has annoyed and vexed in the past what wholesome result will be accomplished by entering into a four-power pact concerning the peace in regard to islands in a remote region of the Pacific Ocean?

Now we have an opportunity to make clear beyond dispute the attitude of the Government of the United States, that the questions defined in the amendment to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Nevada, admittedly domestic questions, will not be submitted by the United States to a conference of other powers. Now is the time to say that it is the policy of this Government to reserve unto itself the exclusive right to determine those questions. If you will do that, and Japan agrees to the treaty, you will have accomplished something. If you refuse to do it, you will not have laid the ghost which has frightened, if it has not terrorized, a beautiful, prosperous, glorious section of the United States.

Underlying the question of Japanese land ownership, Japanese immigration, and race equality, as asserted by Japan, are instincts and convictions that can neither be influenced nor dominated by senatorial action. You can not drive from the breasts of the people who live in the beautiful State of California the conviction that for themselves, under their constitution and laws, they will determine who shall own real property in California.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not only the State of California, but a number of other Western States have adopted similar laws and there are more pending. As this blight has consumed the richest valleys of California, it is moving eastward all the time. It has commenced to affect the people all over the West. It is going to affect them more and more, because it is a notorious fact that the so-called gentlemen's agreement with Japan with regard to immigration is a fraud on this Government. Every day of the world one can meet Japanese laborers right in the city of Washington, for instance, who can not speak more than two or three words of the English language, and some of them will admit they have only been in the United States six months. That can be ascertained right down here at the Japanese employment bureau.

There is nothing to prevent them coming in under the gentlemen's agreement. They are not prohibited from going into Mexico, and when they get into Mexico they are outside of the jurisdiction of the Japanese Government. They walk across the border of the United States as they see fit. It is getting worse all the time. No part of this country is going to submit to it finally. It is acute now only in the Western States, but it is going to be acute elsewhere. We might as well settle this question, and have done with it now, because there are going to be measures brought before Congress absolutely excluding the Japanese from this country. It may be the cause of a lot of trouble, but I say we should fix it now while dealing with this question, and let them understand it, instead of putting the trouble upon posterity.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada is right when he states that the question to which I have been addressing myself is not confined to the State of California. I was using California as an illustration, for in that State the situation, as respecting conflict between Japanese claims to the right of land ownership and the assertion of their claims, has been more acute than perhaps in any other State. Instead of solving the problem we are merely prolonging and postponing it and making the final solution more difficult.

If the Washington conference and the treaties negotiated through its instrumentality have engendered in the minds of the representatives of Japan the belief that through these treaties or otherwise she is to be given her way, and her citizens permitted to come into the United States and take over and own real estate and, through economic measures, gain control of large territories in this country, that conference will have postponed the settlement of a great problem which it ought to have solved, and will have done more harm than good.

Why not deal frankly? Why all this mystery? Why should there be any question about whether it is in the treaty or not in it? We know that the most important problem connected with all the subjects of negotiation entered into by the Washington conference was the very one which the conference for some reason refused to deal with definitely.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has undergone a change of heart and concluded that it is necessary to put in this treaty the declaration which he scorned to place in the four-power treaty. While we are doing it let us make the accomplishment so effective that all will know we have performed our duty wisely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to be the desire of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to convey the impression that Senators on this side of the aisle, when the League of Nations discussion was pending some two years ago, objected to having it made definite and certain that the United States alone should be the judge as to whether or not a question was of a domestic nature. He has sought to convey to the Senate the impression that Senators on this side of the aisle voted against having the United States judge for itself.

That is absolutely incorrect in accordance with the record. It is true that when the reservation which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] offered was pending in the Senate the Democrats, with one or two exceptions, voted against it, but it was not on the ground of the immigration question. It was because there was a ridiculous element in that reservation, and I regret somewhat that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has incorporated that in the reservation now presented. For instance, that reservation provided not only that the United States reserved to itself domestic questions, such as immigration, the tariff, labor, and questions that were purely domestic, but it included, as the reservation now offered by the Senator from Nevada includes, a statement that traffic in women and children was a question entirely domestic.

That was what we objected to at that time, because this country has for years entered into treaties with other countries to restrict and prohibit international traffic in women and children, and it is not a domestic question when it comes to an international traffic. It was a great evil; it was only suppressed by international agreements, and it was those agreements which were to be placed under the jurisdiction of the League of Nations, just as other international agreements were to be. It was for that reason we voted against the reservation.

Moreover, I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin that the matter did not rest there, and he ought to remember that. I myself offered a reservation which covered the subject, and 36 Democrats voted for it, all the Democrats except two voting for it, and every Republican voting against it. It read as follows:

> 4. That the United States is not required and hereby declines to submit to the league, its council or assembly, for decision, report, or recommendation, any matter which it considers to be a domestic question, such as immigration, labor, tariff, or other matters relating to its internal affairs.

I can read to the Senator, if he desires, the names of Democrats who voted for that reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I can read to him the names of those who voted against it, including the Senator from Wisconsin himself. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Did the Senator at that time think the reservation proposed by him was necessary for the protection of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fact that I offered it indicated that I thought it was wise, and as long as the question had been raised whether or not that matter could be decided by the council, I was willing, and every Democrat in the Senate was willing, to have it definitely stated, just as we now contend that the United States should be the sole and only judge of whether a question presented is domestic or not. I ask the Senator whether he is not misrepresenting us in that particular?

Mr. LENROOT. No; because I was just going to ask the Senator another question. Did he not vote for the Versailles treaty without that or any other reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I cast a great many votes, and I was ready to take the Versailles treaty.

Mr. LENROOT. Without any reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Without any reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But when it came down to a question of discussion I presented a number of reservations, and this was one of them. So it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator who voted against it to charge us with not being ready to have the United States reserve to itself, as we now propose that it shall reserve to itself, the decision of whether a question is domestic or not, particularly now when immigration is involved.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator could not have thought it necessary or he surely would not afterwards have voted for the Versailles treaty without any reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I see the Senator from Wisconsin does not withdraw his charge. He allows it to stand just as it was.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. The Senator from Wisconsin repeats that the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Nevada, and others of his colleagues, did not at that time think this reservation of such importance that they were not willing to vote for the Versailles treaty without it, and they did vote for the Versailles treaty without it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, we voted for this reservation. I brought the reservation here and demanded a roll call on it;

we had a roll call on it, and the Democratic Senators went on record in favor of it, and yet the Senator does not withdraw his charge that the Democrats did not stand for that position then just as they stand for it now.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not, because the Senator abandoned that position when he voted for the Versailles treaty without that reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; this was after the vote to which the Senator referred. This was the last position taken, and it was my position at that time.

Now, Mr. President, another thing. It seems to become an issue here as to whether or not I offered as an amendment to the treaty pending on Friday what is now offered as a reservation by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I would like to know when I had an opportunity to offer it. I rose here and called attention to the fact before the vote had come, before the treaty had beeen ratified, that a very important part of the treaty had been dropped out, had beeen ignored, and had not been acted on.

I supposed when I called attention to the fact that the great constitutional lawyer from Wisconsin or the eminent scholar statesman from Massachusetts would take the proper parliamentary course to have it acted on. It would not have been difficult. All that was required was a motion to recommit it to the committee, vote on it in committee, and report it back to the Senate, and that would have ended it. It could have been handled in 15 minutes, or at least in half an hour. But instead of that these great statesmen, constitutional and otherwise, insisted on pushing it through, until they have found themselves in such a muddle that they are now forced, after two days of debate, to come in and present as a reservation the very thing that they undertook to laugh out of court as a part of the treaty.

I shall vote for the reservation, but I can not consider that it puts the United States in the position that we would be in if it were incorporated as a part of the treaty. As presented it is an admission to Japan that the declaration is not a part of the treaty which we are supposed to have ratified on Friday, and Japan can go on and ratify the treaty with the four articles ratified by the Senate on Friday, and Japan can do as she pleases with regard to the ratification of the supplementary treaty. Japan can do more than that. Japan can decline to accept the reservation which is now presented for ratification. Japan can decline to accept the reservation and leave you hanging between heaven and earth as to whether you will accept it without a reservation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Japan can decline to accept any of the treaties.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but Japan will not. Japan will be very eager to accept the four-power treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, I do not doubt it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; she will accept it, because by the four-power treaty she gets the United States as an ally, because by the four-power treaty she gets a guaranty practically of the support, moral if not armed, of the United States in the possessions which she holds in the Pacific Ocean.

Japan will be very sure to ratify that treaty, but when it comes to ratifying the treaty which we are to act upon to-day she may or she may not accept it. If she accepts it, she may or she may not accept our reservation, or she may in accepting the treaty specifically say that she declines to accept our reservation. Thus we are leaving this great question, which in Japan is a great national question, the great question of controversy with the United States, in a state of uncertainty. So, while I shall vote for the reservation now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts after two days, in which his mind has gradually reached a point where he thought he had to do something, I shall vote for it with the feeling that it is a weak substitute for what would have been a conclusive provision in the original treaty.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, just a word touching the attenuated distinction which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] finds to exist between the entertainment by the council of the League of Nations of a question said to be a domestic question and the entertainment of a like question by a conference called under the provisions of the four-power pact.

I wish to remind the Senator just exactly what the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations are in the particular to which he has referred. He must, of course, have referred to this clause of article 15 of the covenant, namely:

> If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

Mr. President, admitting for the purpose of the discussion that that would include questions of jurisdiction, which is by no means clear, what does it mean? It means that if a controversy were submitted to the council of the league which the United States insisted involved a domestic question and not an international question, and every one of the seven powers represented upon the council, exclusive of the United States and the other party to the controversy, said we were wrong about it, that it was, in fact, an international and not a domestic question, what then? Then the United States agrees, assuming, of course, that the clause referred to includes question of jurisdiction, that it will not go to war with the other country; that is all.

We are not going to go to war with any country of which I can think on account of any tariff question; and I scarcely think we would care to wage war with any country on the question of the traffic in women and children; but, of course, there is a possibility that we might become involved in war with some country on such a question as immigration. However, so far as human intelligence can forecast the future, there is not a chance of our getting into war with any country except Japan on that question, and we are never going to go to war with Japan on account of any question of immigration. We are perfectly satisfied with the situation as it stands. We are entitled, if we care to do so, to exclude Japanese from this country. We have no treaty that we shall not do so. We have a "gentlemen's agreement" that Japan will not allow Japanese to come here. The situation is perfectly satisfactory to us. So far as that element is concerned, we are not going to make war upon Japan. If Japan should choose to enact a provision of law to the effect that no white people shall be admitted as immigrants to Japan for commercial purposes, the United States would not utter a word by way of protest. Japan has that kind of a law now, in substance, and it is perfectly satisfactory to us. In other words, we are not going to make war upon Japan, however much she may be disposed to make war upon us upon any question of immigration.

So, Mr. President, we might say that such a possibility is so remote that the illustration to which the Senator from Wisconsin has invited our attention can not be regarded by statesmen as worthy of any consideration. For all practical purposes the two occupy identically the same situation. It was, however, deemed necessary by the esteemed Senator from Massachusetts and his associates upon the other side of the Chamber to put that limitation upon the covenant. Now, they think it is not necessary to attach it to the pending treaty. What is the difference? The Versailles treaty was framed and presented by a Democratic President, while the treaty now before us was framed and presented by a Republican President. That is all the difference between the two propositions. Why dissimulate about it? Why seek to escape from the perfectly obvious conclusion that the thing is right or wrong as it comes from a Democratic or a Republican President?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, what is the question on which the vote is to be taken?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when Mr. HEFLIN'S name was called). I wish to say that my colleague [Mr. HEFLIN] is absent from the city on business of the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. On this question I am informed he would vote as I am about to vote, therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. If he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE. I inquire if the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with that Senator. I am informed that if present he would vote as I propose to vote on all matters relating to the treaty now under consideration. Therefore I shall take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CARAWAY. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]. I am unable to obtain a transfer of that pair. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent and is paired by transfer with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If present, the senior Senator from Texas would vote "yea" on the pending amendment and would also have voted "yea" on the so-called Robinson amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 49, as follows:

So Mr. PITTMAN's amendment to the reservation offered by Mr. LODGE was rejected.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I offer as an amendment to the reservation proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] a reservation which was voted on when the four-power treaty was under consideration.

This reservation expresses the understanding of the United States that the parties to the four-power treaty will respect the rights and possessions of other nations, and will refrain from aggressive acts themselves. It also provides that if a dispute which is not settled by diplomacy arises between any one of the four powers and an outside nation, all nations claiming an interest in the controversy shall be permitted to participate in a conference called to settle the controversy.

In view of the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts a day or two ago did not see fit to incorporate in the four-power treaty the declaration which he now presents as a reservation to this treaty, I express the hope that he will recede from the position heretofore taken, and accept this very wholesome reservation, which will relieve me from much anxiety in regard to the effect of the four-power treaty and the treaty supplementary to it.

I ask that the reservation may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reservation will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the resolution of ratification of "Executive O," the following:

And the United States understands that each of the high contracting parties will respect the rights and possessions of all other nations, and refrain from all acts of aggression against any other power or powers.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties and any other power or powers a controversy which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord existing between any party or parties to this compact and any other power or powers, the high contracting parties shall invite all powers claiming an interest in the controversy to a joint conference to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment to the reservation was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, is this question on the ratification of the supplemental treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is on the adoption of the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The reservation was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the resolution of ratification as amended.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive O, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, an agreement between the United States, the British Empire, France, and Japan, supplementary to the treaty between the same four powers relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions, and defining the application of the term "insular possessions and insular dominions" as relating to Japan, signed at Washington February 6, 1922, subject to the following reservation and understanding, which is hereby made a part and condition of this resolution of ratification and which repeats the declaration of intent and understanding made by the representatives of the powers signatories of the four-power treaty relating to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the Pacific Ocean.

1. That the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions shall apply to the mandated islands in the Pacific Ocean: Provided, however, That the making of the treaty shall not be deemed to be an assent on the part of the United States of America to the mandates and shall not preclude agreements between the United States of America and the mandatory powers, respectively, in relation to the mandated islands.

2. That the controversies to which the second paragraph of article 1 of the four-power treaty relating to Pacific possessions refers shall not be taken to embrace questions which, according to principles of international law, lie exclusively within the domestic jurisdiction of the respective powers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the treaty has to be reported to the Senate, does it not?

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the question now on the ratification of the treaty?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the next question we shall be reaching.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I want to say just a sentence in regard to the ratification of this treaty.

I vote for the ratification of this treaty, but I do so because it modifies and minimizes the four-power treaty. I would not vote for it if it were an independent instrument; but I vote for it solely and alone because it minimizes the other treaty.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the roll is called I desire to state that in voting for this treaty I do so because it tends to sterilize the quadruple alliance.

Several SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the treaty may be reported to the Senate and submitted to a vote, unless it has been reported to the Senate. If so, the fact escaped me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it has not yet been reported to the Senate.

The treaty, with the resolution of ratification, as amended, was reported to the Senate and the amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification, as amended. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARAWAY (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]; but as he would vote on this question as I expect to vote, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. CULBERSON's name was called). The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, so I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. HEFLIN's name was called). The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is necessarily detained on business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCCORMICK (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. However, as his vote upon this question, as upon others to-day, would be like my own, in accordance with my understanding with him I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NEW (when his name was called). Repeating my previous announcement, I vote "yea."

Mr. BROUSSARD (when Mr. RANSDELL's name was called). The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained on business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, if present, would vote as I intend to vote on this question. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], if present, would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is absent on official business, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is unavoidably absent. If present they would vote "yea."

The roll call resulted—yeas 73, nays 0, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 73 and the nays none. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the resolution of ratification as amended is agreed to and the treaty is ratified.

NAVAL ARMAMENT TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to call up the treaty on the limitation of naval armament, which I will ask to have read by title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the treaty by title.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY:

Executive L. Treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament.

Mr. LODGE. I shall not ask to have the treaty read to-night, but I wished to bring it before the Senate, so that it would be the unfinished business.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 174).

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The Assistant Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10329) "making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 13, 18, 19, 20, 27, 29, 30, 32, 34, 35, 40, 44, 45, 48, 52, 57, 60, 61, 62, 63, 66 67, 84, 87, 102, 105, 106, 109, 110, and 111.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 23, 36, 37, 41, 46, 49, 64, 65, 68, 69, 88, 92, 95, 98, 99, 101, 104, 107, and 108; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$60,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$12,300"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$3,600"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$19,900"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$13,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$17,100"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$14,520"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$600"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 17: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$18,120"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment number 21: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$14,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$17,600"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$450"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 25: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$15,490"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 26: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$14,650"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$18,250"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$13,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$17,100"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the sum stricken out by said amendment, and on page 15 of the bill, in line 19, strike out "1922" and insert in lieu thereof "1921"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows. In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Vancouver, Spokane, and Seattle, Washington"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$525,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "For the continued investigation of the feasibility of irrigation, water storage, and related problems on the Colorado River and investigation of water sources of said river, $100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$325,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 85: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$225,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 86: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$1,450,940"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 89: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 89, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$65,500"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 90: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$178,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

F. E. WARREN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
LEE S. OVERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
C. D. CARTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this is a partial report. There were a great many differences, probably over a hundred. There are quite a large number yet undisposed of, some of them of rather a serious nature, which will provoke some debate, without doubt, unless we send it back on the theory that it must go back anyway. I therefore move the adoption of the report.

Mr. McNARY. Before the motion is put, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee what action the Senate conferees took with regard to the appropriation for the national park in Arizona?

Mr. WARREN. That has gone to the House among the items unacted on, except to have it sent back.

Mr. McNARY. There has been no decision upon it?

Mr. WARREN. No decision whatever.

Mr. McNARY. It would not be proper at this time to move that the Senate conferees insist on the amendment?

Mr. WARREN. I hardly think at this stage that would be proper. I judge there will be more or less inquiry, and perhaps I had better let the matter go over until to-morrow and have it printed in the meantime.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will go over and be printed.

As in legislative session,

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ODDIE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Public Service Commission of Nevada, praying for the repeal of sections 13 and 15a of the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MOSES presented a resolution adopted by the Hampton Falls (N. H.) Grange, favoring the sharing by union labor in the matters of deflation of wages and increase in working hours as essential to the welfare of New Hampshire so as to conform to existing agricultural conditions, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of members of the congregation of the Union Evangelical Church, of Three Rivers, and sundry citizens of Andover and Groton, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for the ratification of the treaties prepared by the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two.

Resolutions in favor of an amendment of the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor of women and minors.

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts, believing that there is injustice, both to industries and labor, by reason of the lack of uniformity in the laws of the several States respecting the hours of labor of women and minors, respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States that Congress propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving it power to regulate the hours of labor of women and minors and to make the same uniform throughout the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted March 8, 1922.
In senate, adopted in concurrence March 13, 1922.
A true copy. Attest:

F. W. COOK,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRANCE presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

SENATE OF MARYLAND,
February 23, 1922.

Joint resolution introduced, read first time, and referred to the committee on agriculture and labor.

Whereas the development of the farm implement and machinery business in the United States has resulted in the production of vast numbers of differing types and sizes of such labor-saving devices; and

Whereas manufacture and distribution of such a great multiplicity of types and models of farm implements and machinery results in a vast economic waste through duplication of plant, operating costs, advertising costs, and selling expense and adds to the price which the farmer must pay for farm machinery and implements of all kinds; and

Whereas during the recent war the War Industries Board made substantial strides toward the standardization of certain kinds and types of farm implements and machinery with consequent economic advantage to both manufacturer and the farmer: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Maryland, That the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry of the United States be requested and urged to investigate the feasibility of causing all forms and types of farm implements and machinery to be standardized so as to eliminate uneconomic duplication and waste and the consequent enhancement in cost of production and distribution of such implements and machinery; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the chairman of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry of the United States and to the chairman of the Committees on Agriculture in the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3307) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to the city of Springfield, Mass., certain streets within the Springfield Armory Military Reservation, Mass., and for other purposes (Rept. 578); and

A bill (H. R. 10297) to extend the limitations of time upon the issuance of medals of honor, distinguished service crosses, and distinguished service medals to persons who served in the Army of the United States during the World War (Rept. No. 577).

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3342) granting an increase of pension to Louisa White (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McNARY:

By Mr. BALL (by request):

A bill (S. 3346) to amend section 1180 of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of laws in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A bill (S. 3347) to provide surgical or medical treatment for the men of the Army, National Guard, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey who have been honorably discharged from the service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3348) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to render final judgment on any claims of the Cherokee Nation against the United States in relation to tribal lands, funds, or property; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. NEW:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 183) recognizing title of Lieutenant Colonel Mears as a commissioned officer; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 184) authorizing the President to send the World War Foreign Debt Commission or a representative or representatives of said commission or other commissioners or delegates whom he may select to represent him to the International Economic Conference to be held at Genoa; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS OF WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $350,000 for the preparation for historical purposes of certain documents and information concerning officers and soldiers from the several States and the District of Columbia who were in the military service of the United States during the World War, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10871, the War Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that appropriations or allotments for general improvement or maintenance shall hereafter be available for the dredging of channels to landing places when satisfactory evidence is submitted by the localities concerned that such channels will be used by commerce to an extent commensurate with the cost and that other landing places are not economically available to serve the same localities or industries, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10871, the War Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on March 27, 1922, the President had approved and signed the act (S. 3265) construing the expression "all employees in the classified civil service of the United States," as used in section 1 of the act of May 22, 1920, entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 27, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth, from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God. Be pleased, O Lord, to look upon our earthly state with Thine eye of beneficence. Let us know that Thou art with us to-day by the elevation of our thoughts, by our conscious strength, and by our springing joys. Hush anxieties, subdue fear, and still the tumult of the troubled heart. May our citizenship be bound together by faith and confidence and united in a common zeal in a common consecration to our country. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, the new Member from the third district of Maine, Hon. JOHN E. NELSON, is present. His certificate of election has been filed in the office and he is ready to be sworn in. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

EXTENSION OF THE PENSION ACT OF MAY 7, 1912.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, by the direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 211. To extend the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, to the officers and enlisted men of all State militia and other State organizations that rendered service to the Union cause during the Civil War for a period of 90 days or more, and providing pensions for their widows, minor children, and dependent parents, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 837).

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

ISSUING PATENTS FOR CERTAIN LANDS IN LASSEN COUNTY, CALIF.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 10554) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to Lassen County, Calif., for certain lands, and for other purposes, be transferred from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10554 be transferred from the Private Calendar to the Union Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, these bills usually go on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RAKER. I understand that heretofore they have been referred to the Union Calendar, and for that reason I ask unanimous consent that this be transferred. It is for public purposes only.

Mr. WALSH. It is a county matter.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; it is a county matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 160.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming. In view of the gentleman's program outlined for to-day, I want to call the Speaker's attention to a point of order made on Senate joint resolution 160 at the time it was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It occurs to me that the point of order is well taken; that is to say, if it is not a revenue bill, it can be considered in the House; but if the Chair holds that it is a revenue bill, then undoubtedly the House ought to pass a resolution returning it to the Senate with the suggestion that it is a revenue measure and should originate in the House under the Constitution. In view of the program to-day, it occurred to me that it ought to be called to the attention of the Speaker, in order that he may look the matter up and determine it to-day, so that if it is necessary to return it to the Senate the gentleman from Michigan may, if he sees proper, reintroduce it in the House and have an opportunity to consider it this week. If necessary, I will make the point of order that it is a revenue bill and that it should originate in the House of Representatives, and that a resolution should be passed sending it back to the Senate calling their attention to it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman makes the point of order that it is a revenue bill?

Mr. GARNER. I have not examined the matter sufficiently to determine that point. I merely make the point of order in order that the Chair may investigate it. I had just as soon make it as not being a revenue bill, as I make the point of order only for the purpose of getting a decision by the Chair, so that he may take such action as may be necessary under that decision.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE AND JUSTICE AND THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. HUSTED, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 11065) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 838), which was read a first and second time, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN and Mr. WALSH reserved all points of order.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriation for the War Department.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, this being District day, we are once more called upon to forfeit our rights on the floor. I am somewhat loath to do that on account of having such a large amount of business ready to be considered by the House, but I am advised that they are very desirous of going on with the military bill, and in consideration of the fact that it is more important than District business I am willing to waive our rights for to-day, but I hope that in due time an opportunity will be given for the consideration of urgent and pressing business that is ready for consideration by the House for the District.

The motion of Mr. ANTHONY was agreed to; accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation, $27,635,260.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, we have now reached the item in the bill——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me to offer an amendment so that we may have the amendment under consideration?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 114, line 24, after the word "navigation" strike out the figures "$27,635,260" and insert in lieu thereof "$42,815,661."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the committee adopted exactly the figures approved by the Budget for rivers and harbors work for the next fiscal year. The amount of $27,600,000 will keep in a state of proper maintenance the existing river and harbor work, and in addition approximately half that amount will be expended upon the continuation of the projects which have been heretofore authorized and which are now in process of construction.

In other words, the expenditure of the $27,000,000 will be about on a 50–50 basis between maintenance and the continuance of construction on approved projects.

The House should also understand that in addition to this $27,000,000 there will be approximately $15,000,000 carried over into the next fiscal year from previous appropriations. So that with the approval of the $27,000,000 estimate there will be approximately $40,000,000 available to be expended on rivers and harbors during the next fiscal year, which is more than the average which has been used for that purpose for the last 10 years.

It is true that the report of the Chief of Engineers recommended about $42,000,000 for this purpose, but the Budget estimate is based upon the fact that certain of those projects which are not deemed absolutely necessary may be maintained at somewhat less than the maximum which the Engineers reported to be necessary. In view of the fact that we are all engaged in the endeavor to reduce expenditures for the current year, and the apparent necessity for economy, the subcommittee deemed it inadvisable to exceed the Budget estimate for this purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the subcommittee increased the Budget estimate on any item?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has on one or two small items.

Mr. MONDELL. To what extent?

Mr. ANTHONY. To a very limited extent. I do not think we have increased the Budget estimate more than a few hundred thousand dollars, perhaps, in a total of $27,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. On the other hand, you have largely reduced the Budget estimates.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have very largely reduced the Budget estimates.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The increases which you have made do not represent any difference in principle with the Bureau of the Budget. They are simply a few thousand dollars in regard to details.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You have not differed with them in general principle on their estimates?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true. During the hearings held by the committee on the rivers and harbors item there was only one gentleman who appeared before that committee who recommended an increase in the estimates of the Budget. In fact, the committee were given to understand that $27,000,000 represented a sum which met with the approval of those gentlemen in the House who are interested in river and harbor work, and met the approval of many of those who had large river and harbor projects in their districts; and we felt that the figure of $27,000,000 would be an adequate one to properly take care of river and harbor projects during the next fiscal year.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to ask the gentleman what sum remains over from other appropriations in the hands of the engineers in addition to the $27,000,000 recommended by his committee?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my understanding that on the first of the year there was about $32,000,000 unexpended. At the end of this fiscal year there will be about $15,000,000 unexpended, which will be applicable to work during the next fiscal year.

Mr. TREADWAY. So, as a matter of fact, there will be available for the fiscal year for which we are now appropriating something like $42,000,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; which is more than the average for the last 10 years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Of that $15,000,000 which will remain at the end of the fiscal year how much is allocated to specific objects and not subject to general distribution?

Mr. ANTHONY. About $8,000,000 are involved in contracts on existing projects and about $3,000,000 are sums which were appropriated for specific projects which for local reasons and other reasons the War Department deems it inadvisable to proceed with.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But that can not be used for any other object than what is specifically legislated for.

Mr. ANTHONY. That $3,000,000 of which I speak could be applied for general river and harbor purposes by amendment to this bill or by resolution of the House.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But the bill does not contain any such provision.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then in considering this $3,000,000 it should be remembered that it is specifically allocated and that there is only $7,000,000 which can be used for general distribution, making a total of $34,000,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the sum I have just spoken of exists to the credit of river and harbor projects to-day and can be used for that purpose.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But is specifically allocated?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The $8,000,000 which is under contract is, of course, a portion of the expenditures that will be made. The fact that it is under contract does not in any wise differentiate it from other river and harbor expenditures. It is under contract generally on large and important projects.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that when the hearings were held General Taylor stated that on December 1, 1921, as the gentleman from Kansas stated, there was $28,324,000 unexpended, of which $9,774,000 was under contract, leaving a balance unobligated of $18,550,000. On Saturday I telephoned General Taylor, Assistant Chief of Engineers, asking him how much money was then unobligated, and he told me that on March 1, 1922, there was $15,584,000 of money heretofore appropriated that remained unobligated.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The actual balance on March 1 was $23,784,000.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I suggest to the chairman of the subcommittee that it would be well to agree upon some time for debate on this item.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be advisable to fix a limit of time for debate on this item. What would the gentleman suggest as being necessary?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have been asked for an hour and a half, and I think I will be asked for fully two hours.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will say to the gentleman that I should like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I suggest that we use four hours.

Mr. ANTHONY. We could not devote that much time to it. If we use two hours and a half in debate on rivers and harbors, the time to be equally divided between those sides, I think it would be satisfactory.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Give us an hour and a half. I have requests for over an hour and a half already.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would state to the gentleman that a number of gentlemen on this side of the House—and I am sure on the Republican side also—who are interested in this particular item were promised time during general debate. I was to have 20 minutes, but I did not get any. We desisted at that time with the understanding that we would have a liberal debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, if we fix a limit of three hours for debate upon this paragraph, one-half to be consumed by the gentlemen who are in favor of the $27,000,000 item and one-half by those who are in favor of increasing the amount, I think it would be satisfactory.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is the Chair to determine the recognition?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let the time be divided, one-half to the gentleman from Kansas and one-half to myself.

Mr. ANTHONY. If that is agreeable to gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to know about the division of time.

Mr. ANTHONY. The proposition is that debate be limited to three hours, one-half to be consumed by those in favor of the sum named in the bill and one-half by those who desire to increase it.

Mr. SISSON. Can we not have assurance that we may have some time on this side? Two gentlemen on this side, it was virtually agreed, might have considerably more in the five minutes. I refer to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the committee and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], if that is satisfactory.

Mr. SISSON. As a minority member of the subcommittee, I feel that I might have a little time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we may be able to yield a portion of our time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am willing to give the gentleman from Mississippi a part of my time.

Mr. SISSON. Suppose we make this agreement if we can, that the two gentlemen give this side an hour of the time and I shall yield that to those for and against the amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MANN. Make it one hour to each of the three gentlemen—the gentleman from Kansas, the gentleman from Mississippi, and the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate upon the paragraph and all amendments thereto be limited to three hours, one hour to be controlled by himself, one hour by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], and one hour by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it has been suggested that that will give those favorable to the increased appropriation two hours and those opposed to it one hour. That is hardly a fair division. I do not know of anyone on the other side who is not in favor of this raid on the Treasury. I think the original proposition ought to stand, that the time shall be divided equally between those for and against the proposition.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand it, the gentleman from Kansas and myself have agreed that the division shall be made. I do not understand that the gentleman from Wyoming objects.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not object to a division equally between those for and against, but the proposition here is to divide it into three different hours.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is to give the Democratic side one-third of the time.

Mr. MONDELL. Then two gentlemen will yield to gentlemen for and one gentleman to those against. That is not a fair division of the time.

Mr. SISSON. I shall make an effort to divide the time equally between those for and against.

Mr. DEMPSEY. There is no disposition to divide it up into any large divisions or factors.

Mr. ROACH. I would like to have five minutes of time, and if the time is not sufficient to grant me that time, I shall object.

Mr. DEMPSEY. We are going to divide it into five-minute factors. I think the gentleman can have his five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not. An amendment was read merely for information.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman yielded to me to offer it. However, I offer the amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 114, line 24, after the word "navigation," strike out $27,635,260" and insert in lieu thereof "$42,815,661."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, if there is a point of order to be made, I think it should be disposed of, if the Chairman pleases. We are reserving three hours for debate, and we should not go into three hours of debate with a point of order reserved. If the gentleman has any point of order, I wish he would state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the amendment embraces an amount that is unauthorized by existing legislation with respect to rivers and harbors. The Appropriation Committee can appropriate only such money as existing legislation would authorize, and existing legislation at this time does not authorize this amount of $42,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment comes before the House under different conditions from those which have confronted it at any time when a rivers and harbors bill has been considered. In normal times the railroads of this country are totally unable to carry the traffic offered them. We have seen within a short period of time the wheat of the West unable to reach the market because the railroads could not carry it to the seaboard. We have seen this situation, that the grain-growing farmer of the West could have obtained a good price for his product if he could have had the transportation, but he was unable to secure that. The railroads of the country want $2,000,000,000 for additional trackage, rolling stock, and terminal facilities.

They are not going to obtain that amount, and if they did obtain it they would not be able to make the necessary improvements in 10 years. So the question is as to what will occur when we return to normal times. We will find that what we raise and what we manufacture in this country can not reach the markets unless we relieve our railroads by adequate river and harbor facilities. In addition to that, we find this situation: For the first time in the history of the United States we are providing for a merchant marine. We have spent vast sums of money in building the ships. We are about to sell them and transfer them to private ownership, and at the same time we are going to provide the means to see that those ships sail the seas. Is this the time, when we can not carry our traffic by rail; is this the time when it will be impossible for us to utilize this merchant marine unless we improve our rivers and harbors; is this the time unduly to economize in our appropriation for that purpose? Another thing. We are at the end of a great war.

During the period of that war we were told that we should make no appropriation for rivers and harbors unless it was certified by the Secretary of War as being a war necessity. New work was not prosecuted and even the ordinary work of maintenance of harbors was not done. The harbors of our country were allowed to silt and fill. In numerous places where we have adopted a project depth we not only have not secured the depth provided by the project but, on the contrary, the harbors have filled up so that we have a less depth than we had at the time the project was adopted. Now let us take the situation as to the amount to be appropriated. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] says that with the $27,000,000 we will be in position to maintain our rivers and harbors and to prosecute new projects. Let us examine the testimony of those who have studied the question. Let us see what they say upon that subject. Let us see whether they agree with the gentleman from Kansas. Throughout this country we have district engineers stationed. It is their duty to study the rivers and harbors in their districts and find out what the needs are. They are men who have made this a life study.

They have had a technical education in engineering at West Point, and at the end of their courses in the academy we have placed them in the Engineering Corps, which is the highest corps, made up of the men who demonstrated the greatest ability, who stood highest at West Point. These district engineers, after exhaustive study, have presented their reports to the Chief of Engineers showing that there is needed for the ensuing fiscal year $63,000,000. The Chief of Engineers, realizing that in this Congress we have attempted to economize and have economized, understanding fully that Congress would not appropriate a cent that was not actually and badly needed, revised these estimates and cut them down to $42,000,000. Let us study the situation as to this cut and the amount carried in the bill. The subcommittee has reported $27,000,000 in place of the $42,000,000 recommended by the Chief of Engineers. How did $27,000,000 happen to be adopted? Rivers and harbors appropriations are unlike other appropriations, in that they do not lapse at the end of the fiscal year, and sometimes there remain in projects certain sums which are unexpended after the project has been completed.

It was thought when this $27,000,000 figure was adopted that $15,000,000 could be obtained from unexpended balances to the credit of completed projects and that thus we would make up the $42,000,000 so badly needed. Instead of that, we find that from completed projects there can be obtained the sum and only the sum of $126,000. So we have $27,000,000 in this bill and we need $42,000,000. Now, the gentleman from Kansas says we have on hand $23,000,000. The situation as to that is this: Two years ago we had $60,000,000 in unexpended balances. A year ago we had $37,500,000 in the Treasury to the credit of various projects. To-day we have $23,000,000, the smallest balance we have had since 1916, and $8,000,000 of this small sum is already pledged on contracts where the work is being done, and we have still the months of March, April, May, and June, four months, one-third of a year, one-third of that part of the year during which, on account of favorable and mild weather conditions, a large amount of work will be done. So at the end of the fiscal year, as matter of fact, we will not have anything in the Treasury unexpended, and we will have to depend entirely on the sum which we appropriate here.

Now let us make a comparison. Last year, when we did not do anything like the amount of work we ought to do, we expended $41,000,000. With our harbors and rivers in bad condition through neglect during and since the war; with the railroads unable to get the products of the farm and the factory to destination for a good market or even in time to save them from injury and decay; with the highest rail freight rates in the history of the country and no prospect of any considerable reduction; with the waterways affording the only chance to relieve congestion and afford reasonable rates; in order to utilize our new merchant marine, to help the producer and to relieve the consumer, it is our duty to support the amendment and to adequately provide for the rivers and harbors of the country.

This year we will have $27,000,000. Now, let us contrast what the United States is doing with what the localities are doing in the United States. Let us have one or two illustrations. Let us take the port of Greater New York. In order to transport the manufactures of the country, in order to transport the grain from the western fields over to Liverpool to the consumer and to other countries, we must have the port of New York open. We had congestion during the war. We had freight cars piled up 50 miles outside of New York City. Why was that? It is because of two things.

First, we did not have adequate terminals; we did not have adequate warehouses in the city of New York, and, second, we transported every bit of freight that went to New York, whether it was destined there as its ultimate destination or whether it merely went through New York on its way to its future destination in Europe, through the congested port of the city of New York.

New York is the greatest distributing port in the world. They carried that freight through the very heart of the city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In order to avoid that situation, the port of Greater New York is about to spend between four millions and five millions of dollars. That enormous expenditure will always be valueless and of no avail whatever unless this Congress makes the channel adequate so that they can send their ships up to the new terminals and unload them into the new warehouses and do away with the congestion and transport all of this merchandise abroad. Take the city of Milwaukee, and they are spending there millions of dollars in order to enable them to carry the traffic that comes there on the Great Lakes. And they are going to be unable to do anything unless the Government does its part. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of the time in control of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are about to face the first real test of the Budget. Both sides claim great credit for the adoption of the Budget plan. The committee has proceeded under the Budget in the performance of its duty, and up to this time no recommendations have been made above the figures fixed by the Budget, except a very small amount in one or two items. In the main the Budget estimates have been reduced. Now we are met with what is very apparently an organized assault upon the Budget and the Budget estimates. There are those who are in the habit of referring to river and harbor appropriations as "pork barrel" appropriations. I have never indulged in that kind of talk. In my 25 years here I think I have voted for nearly every river and harbor appropriation, though not a penny of those appropriations is spent anywhere near my State. No man in the House is more earnestly favorable to liberal river and harbor appropriations than I am, and no one would be more willing than I, under proper circumstances and conditions, to increase the appropriation for these useful and worthy purposes. The question is, Shall the budget stand or shall it fall? Are we to be able to go into our districts this fall claiming as one of the credits of the party the establishment of the Budget system and Budget economies or are we going to be compelled shamefacedly to admit that the first time the Budget estimates are attacked by an organized effort to increase what are popularly known as "pork barrel appropriations" the Budget falls?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry. My time is limited.

Are we to carry out our program of economy? Are we to stand by Budget estimates or are our lines to break the first time when organized assault is made by some of the Members who have creeks from which they wish to have the water hyacinths gathered or which they desire to have deepened for a navigation that is hoped for rather than expected?

The fact is that in 30 years the average annual expenditures for rivers and harbors have totaled about $30,000,000. The fact is that at the suggestion of the Members interested in these matters the original Budget estimate of $13,000,000 was raised to $27,000,000. The fact is that, with a balance remaining in the Treasury of approximately $15,000,000 at the beginning of the next fiscal year, there will be available under contract and for new allotment about $42,000,000—$10,000,000 more than the average expenditures for the last 10 years; $12,000,000 more than the average appropriations for the same length of time.

And yet, because there is something of a demand at home for these expenditures, many of them worthy, some very questionable, we are called upon to depart from that policy of economy which we have adopted and adhered to relative to every other Federal activity, and under this organized attack to break through the Budget estimates, depart from our policy of reasonable economy, and subject ourselves to all the criticism of other days relative to "pork-barrel" river and harbor appropriations. I fear that many of the gentlemen who have been asked to support this increase of appropriation have been asked to do it on the theory that if enough money is appropriated for any particular project, no matter how little merit it may have, they may hope to get a little of the rake-off.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only a minute.

I do not know whether it is worth while to appeal to the minority side in behalf of the Budget estimates, although there are many gentlemen on that side who have stood fairly, squarely, and honestly by those principles, and I hope they will not depart from them now. But at least I am justified in appealing to our side, to the side that is in the position of responsibility, to adhere to this estimate, which is nearly double the appropriation of the present year, which is, with the remaining balance, more than equal to the average expenditures for 10 years past, which is the estimate of the Budget, and which is in harmony with our general policy of keeping appropriations and expenditures within the anticipated national income.

Shall we stand by the splendid record we have so far made or shall we allow our lines to be broken and depart from the splendid record that we have made in the face of the first organized assault that is made on the principle of economy and the principle of the Budget?" [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], who, so far as I know, has no navigable river in his own State, and who, to my knowledge, has never been, to say the least, a very earnest advocate of river improvement, complains that the House is being asked by this amendment to exceed the estimates submitted to Congress. That is a rather peculiar position for the gentleman from Wyoming to take in view of what has already happened in this House with reference to certain appropriations, and in view of some of the things which are contemplated shortly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does the gentleman understand that the Director of the Budget himself testified before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—and I have the highest respect for the Director of the Budget, his ability, and his public spirit—that he has been able to give no consideration whatever to this item, and that it is a fact that he does not know anything whatever about it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am glad to have that statement from the gentleman from New York, because it bears out what I expected to say a little later on.

I was about to say that the bill carrying appropriations for independent offices, as it was reported to the House, sought to give to the Shipping Board the right to trench upon $55,000,000 of receipts from sales of surplus and materials, which was never asked for or submitted by way of estimate from the Budget Bureau, and when that proposition was before the House and many of us opposed it, and the House by a large majority voted it down, I do not recall that the gentleman from Wyoming raised his voice in protest against the appropriation at that time or complained that the bill as reported was an assault upon the Bureau of the Budget. [Applause.]

And very shortly, if I am not mistaken, as soon as this bill is disposed of, we are going to again have a motion made in this House to give the Shipping Board the right to use those receipts in addition to the estimates submitted, and I am wondering whether or not the gentleman from Wyoming will oppose that and make one of his usually effective speeches in opposition to it. The gentleman from Wyoming very earnestly favored an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the purchase of seed in two or three States in his particular region, and $1,500,000 was appropriated. It was never recommended by the Director of the Budget. Why not be consistent, even though there be no navigable rivers in the gentleman's own State?

Now, what are the facts in reference to this appropriation? The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] has told you that in the first instance the Chief of Engineers asked for $63,000,000, and he said that even if that $63,000,000 was appropriated it would not enable him to do more than to maintain existing projects and do a certain amount of work upon existing projects, and that a great deal of important work would have to be neglected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In a moment. The Budget Bureau decided on $13,000,000. Protests were made, and it was then sent back to the Chief of Engineers, and he reduced his former estimate to $42,500,000. He said that was the very lowest sum with which he could carry on his work and that he would have to neglect a great deal of important work if only that amount was allowed.

I want to say to you, gentlemen, you who represent inland districts and who favor the improvement of inland rivers, if you do not support this amendment and put through this additional appropriation you will get very little money by way of improvement on the inland waterways, because it is generally understood, and if you will talk to the Chief of Engineers he will tell you, I have no doubt, that if you should appropriate only $27,000,000, practically all of it will be needed and expended in the maintenance and improvement of harbors. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not speaking according to the record.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the record.

Mr. STAFFORD. The record shows that more than $10,000,000 will be used for the inland waterways.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Even if that be true, it is only about one-third of the whole amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is more than has been expended in any year past.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think not. There has been $42,500,000 spent on the average for the past two years. There was appropriated for 1921 $12,000,000, and they had an unexpended balance of $58,000,000 July 1, 1920. This made $70,000,000 for 1921. At the beginning of the present fiscal year there was an unexpended balance of $37,000,000 and there was appropriated the sum of $15,000,000. So the Chief of Engineers has had $85,000,000 for the last two fiscal years. General Taylor says all of this has been obligated and there will only be about $200,000 left at the end of the present fiscal year. So we have reached a point where we can not make appropriations for this work and rely upon their being supplemented by unexpended balances. There will be no unexpended balance, and we must appropriate all that is to be spent next year in this bill. The Chief of Engineers says that he ought to really have $63,000,000, and that he must have $42,500,000 as a minimum. The Director of the Budget says frankly that he has not been able to give the matter any particular consideration and that he does not know anything about it. For my part, under these circumstances and believing as I do very earnestly in river and harbor improvements and its value to the whole country, I prefer to rely upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers. Failure to make this appropriation would result in great economic loss, not only in so far as the value of the improvements to be made are concerned, but also on account of the deterioration of existing projects, which can not be touched unless a reasonable appropriation is made. It is false economy not to provide reasonable funds. The overhead remains the same whether the appropriation be large or small, and Congress ought to make appropriations to complete this work as quickly as possible, so that the present generation can derive as full benefit as possible from these improvements in the transportation of our agricultural and other valuable products and resources.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to give you a few facts. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has been dealing in fancies. From the year 1914 to 1922, inclusive, the total appropriations for rivers and harbors in the river and harbor acts amounted to $275,000,000, or an average of $27,500,000 a year.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Just a very short question.

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield.

I am going to give you facts. Under the sundry civil acts and the river and harbor acts combined there has been appropriated in the last 10 years $300,500,000, or an average of $30,500,000 a year. On the 1st of July, 1921, they had on hand unexpended $44,000,000. They will expend out of that $30,000,000 this year up to the 1st of July, 1922. That leaves them $14,000,000. We are proposing to appropriate $27,000,000. Add to $27,000,000 that $14,000,000 and you have $41,000,000.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] wants $42,000,000. We will give you $41,000,000 without adding a dollar under the gentleman's amendment. If $42,000,000 is all you want, you will have it by refusing to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

I talked with the Assistant Chief of Engineers this morning. He says at the end of 1923, if we give him $27,500,000 and the $14,000,000 which he has now available, he will have on hand out of the $41,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1923 $10,000,000. Now, what do you want? Why do you want to add $15,000,000 to what the committee proposes if with what he has and what the committee proposes he will be able to get along for 1923 and have an unexpended balance of $10,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year? That is all there is to the case. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question before he starts?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman no doubt has been present during the consideration of this Army appropriation bill. Has he noticed that the subcommittee in charge have on practically every item cut the Budget estimates? Would this be disregarding the advice of the Budget, which has been cut here, any more than it has been upon other items cut by the subcommittee?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That may be true. I can not speak accurately or definitely about it.

Mr. Chairman, I was for 13 years a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I do not believe that the facts ever before more thoroughly justified liberal appropriations for the inland rivers than do the facts that we now have. Last year the engineers compiled in the second volume of their report most illuminating statistics on the commerce of the country. Now, listen: The inland rivers of this country, not counting canals and connecting links like the Detroit River and the St. Marys, or anything of that sort, just taking the rivers themselves, the inland rivers in the last year carried 80,000,000 tons of freight. Well, that does not mean anything just by itself. It is like saying that there are 265,000 miles of railroads in the United States. But if you will add to that the statement that that is about one-half the railroad mileage in the world, you will understand what it means. There were 80,000,000 tons of freight hauled on the inland rivers last year, not counting the canals. It would require 1,600,000 big 50-ton box cars, carrying 100,000 pounds each, to haul that freight. Estimating that a train would carry 30 of those loaded box cars, it would take 53,000 trains to haul it. It would take 146 of those trains, running every day, 365 days in the year, to haul the freight that was hauled on the inland rivers last year. The late Mr. James J. Hill said to our committee once that they had never been able to reach that point of efficiency where they could haul every freight car 20 miles a day. If that is true now it would take 22,000 of those big box cars 365 days to move that freight 100 miles. Now, that being true, with the present transportation necessities of the people what we know them to be, can this Congress afford to take the chance of being stingy in this matter? On the rivers of the Mississippi Valley alone we floated last year 51,000,000 tons of American freight.

When we put the Panama Canal through we had Dr. Emory Johnson figure out how much tonnage would go through it in order that we might properly adjust the tolls. His estimate was between 10,000,000 and 10,500,000 tons, of which he estimated that 3,500,000 tons would be American freight. We have never yet reached 10,000,000 tons for the Panama Canal, although we nearly reached it last year, for all the countries of the world. Here last year on these inland streams we carried 80,000,000 tons, and that under the most serious of handicaps.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been in Congress we have performed three major operations on the railroads, and I voted for all three of them. I am very much inclined to think I made a mistake three times. [Laughter.] I am not quite sure about the last bill, whether I was mistaken in voting for that or not, but I voted for it. My doubts are not due to allegations we hear in the usual speeches made here that we gave the railroads $600,000,000 or $800,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 or $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000, according to the fancy of the speaker, because, of course, we did not do that, nor did we guarantee them that they would make 5½ or 6 per cent. What I fear is that we may have handicapped them too much. But even so, we left the power in their hands to hamstring the steamboats. Now, here is the situation: The other day the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] showed how the railroads were discriminating in their rates between shipping points. Here is a river town. The railroad running to that town will reduce the rate, because the town happens to be on the river, and so will run the steamboats off of the river. Now, we changed that law and said they could not give a discriminating rate to a river point unless there was actual river competition; that potential competition was not to be considered. All right. We will take any town on any river. The railroad puts up the rate and does not give a discriminating rate, because there is no actual competition. Then the steamboat people say, "Well, we will put a steamboat in here, running from Cincinnati to Greenville, or from Louisville to Greenville, or from St. Louis to Greenville or any other point, because we can haul the freight for very much less than the railroad charges and still make a lot of money." Well, they consult a lawyer about it, and he says, "That is all right; but you must remember this, that if you put a steamboat on there and begin to haul the freight, then you have actual competition, and as soon as you have actual competition the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to allow the railroads to put in cutthroat rates again and put your steamboat out of business." The result is that they will not put their steamboat on the river at all, and the railroads therefore can not reduce the rates, because there is nothing except potential competition, so these little river points must pay the high railroad rates and be denied the right to use the river by this sword of Damocles that hangs over them. Yet with that handicap the inland rivers of this country last year increased their tonnage tremendously.

In 1879, according to the census—and that is the only estimate we have of it—the rivers in the Mississippi Valley carried 32,000,000 tons of freight. Last year they carried 51,000,000 tons in the face of this handicap provided by the transportation act. It occurs to me, gentlemen, that in view of the fact that farmers and shippers generally in this country are handicapped most seriously by the lack of proper transportation facilities, the last thing we ought to do would be to undertake to economize by cutting down an appropriation which has already been cut away below what it ought to be. As the engineers expressed it, they were instructed to cut it to the bone, and they cut it to the bone. The Budget Committee, who do not know as much about it as you do, cut it to $27,000,000, and therefore that amount becomes sacred with this committee. The engineers said they needed $63,000,000, and the people all over this country are demanding, because their necessities require them to demand, transportation facilities which the railroads can not give them. Where are you going to get the 146 railroad trains extra to run every day in the year for 365 days to move this freight only 100 miles?

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, the Director of the Budget first cut the appropriation to $13,000,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That showed he did not know anything about it. That is all there is about that. He cut it blindly. Then it was increased to $27,000,000 blindly, that is all there is to that. I have great respect for those gentlemen. But they do not know as much about this matter as we do. Now, the amendment proposes simply to make the amount $42,000,000, which the engineers said was the very lowest possible cut that could be made. They knew they had this unexpended balance on hand. You are not telling them anything new about that. They knew what they had on hand. They said, "We have cut the estimates to the bone," and that means $42,000,000 to be appropriated this year in cash, and now it is proposed to cut it below that. I think it would be a very unwise procedure on the part of this House. [Applause.]

Before I close I want to pay some compliments. First, to the engineers for the very illuminating report on the commercial statistics as they appear in volume 2 of the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers. They have not only gathered much more statistical data than ever before, but they have assembled it in numerous tables where they become understandable and instructive. This good start is but a harbinger of what is to follow, and we are under obligations to them for it.

Then I want to compliment General Dawes and congratulate not only the service but the people of the whole Mississippi Valley upon having him in his present position. His heart, as well as his head, is in his work, and if he remains where he is the barge line on the Mississippi will justify the expenditures we have authorized, and better still he will demonstrate the practicability of river transportation, and it will be only a few years before private enterprise will enter that field to stay. He has cooperated in a most intelligent and sympathetic way with the management and by so doing has, I believe, made its success certain.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in this bill as originally presented to the House there were two provisions involving an intrusion by one department into the field of another which I regard as dangerous. The first was that which would give to Congress the allocation of troops. Such a provision is entirely objectionable as a matter of policy and of very doubtful constitutionality. The other is the pending provision under which the legislative department of this Government would abdicate its right to specify the projects for which appropriations are to be made.

I admit that I am in some measure responsible for this change. In the year 1914 I was forced to oppose a bill which contained many extravagant appropriations and to resort to what was popularly known as a filibuster to defeat it. The result was the beginning of this plan to appropriate lump sums to be apportioned in the War Department. That was continued in the following year, 1915. Then the old plan was resumed, but again the lump-sum appropriation was adopted, and has, I think, been continued for the last three years. This Congress ought not to give that responsibility to the executive department. [Applause.] Every appropriation made for a river and harbor should be considered by this House and should be open to the scrutiny of the whole people. This is making no reflection upon the Engineer Corps, to which I have often referred as the blue ribbon of the Government service. But these appropriations should be made after full and free discussion here; otherwise we are evading the responsibility which belongs to us.

Now, I can not favor this increase in appropriations as proposed by this amendment; at least not until every item is brought here for consideration. I do not believe in adding $15,000,000 to these estimates to be apportioned by the Engineer Corps. And I think I may say to some of these gentlemen who have spoken: Your idea that you will relieve congestion on the railways by adding another $15,000,000 is altogether a fallacy. [Applause.] In the first place, the improvements you would make will be deferred for many years, and in the next place classes of traffic that can be carried by the two methods are entirely different. That carried by the rivers is one type and finds its origin in the warehouses and the localities on the banks of the river, while the other makes available traffic in every part of the land. Now, up to about the beginning of this century I was an enthusiast in regard to inland waterway transportation. No one favored it more strongly than I. I spent the summer and a part of the autumn of 1903 in Europe examining the waterways there, which are so much utilized, and I found their conditions were so radically different that we could not take their methods and utilization of canals and rivers as an example for us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio four minutes more.

Mr. BURTON. Again in 1909—and I had made other visits to Europe in the interim, made shorter examinations there—I have examined practically every river and harbor in this country. I became discouraged in regard to this method of hauling freight. I remember in the year 1907 I was in the city of Memphis. The preceding year every warehouse had been crowded, bales of cotton were located on the walks and in the streets, and there was an unheard of congestion, yet not one single bale was carried to New Orleans by water. In the year 1907 President Roosevelt visited Memphis, and with great eclat bound a bale of cotton to be carried down river, but I think that was the only bale shipped at Memphis by water that year. In all that time there was a waterway 10½ feet deep from Cairo to the sea. The head of the Mississippi River Commission told me that in all his trips on the river there had never been a request for improvement for the promotion of navigation, but that every request was made for revetment of the banks or for levees. When I say this I also wish to say that I always favored keeping open that great waterway, the father of the waters, and making generous provision for it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps, in a few moments. While I am willing to review this whole situation in view of the great increase in freight rates, I am not hopeful in regard to the development of traffic on these rivers. It is true that in such a case as the Monongahela, which, by the way, is the river of shallow draft which has the largest traffic where there are many mines near the mills and nearby a great quantity of coal is located, a very large traffic can be developed. I will ask consent to insert certain classes of rivers that I think may be properly improved——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BURTON. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not universally known that the reason that no freight goes down the Mississippi River is on account of the cutthroat methods of the railroads in reducing the rates, say, from Memphis to New Orleans, to an unreasonably low rate?

Mr. BURTON. That is a part of it. I drew a provision which provided that no railroad should reduce its rates in competition with a waterway and afterwards restore that rate unless it could be shown that the lowering was for a purpose other than eliminating competition. That is now the law and it has been helpful. But that is by no means all. It is the greater care taken on the railroad, the fact that when a bale of cotton is taken on a railway the shipper has his bill of lading, can take it to the bank and use it, and the fact that if it is taken on the river he must insure it. Then, too, the transportation is usually much more rapid and shippers prefer the railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BURTON. I subjoin certain classes of rivers the improvement of which I think is proper and desirable: First, rivers which afford access to cities or centers of consumption located at no great distance from the sea, upon which the haul by river can be combined with the movement by sea. Of this class are the Delaware reaching from the city of Philadelphia to the sea, the Patapsco between Baltimore and the Chesapeake Bay, the Mississippi between New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico, the Columbia and the Willamette between Columbia and the Pacific Ocean. Second, rivers of considerable size upon which large cities or industrial centers are located and which can be made the means of transportation between producer and consumer in the shipment of heavy and coarse freights, such as coal, iron ore, or building material. In this class may be included the Ohio and the Hudson, with its canal connection with the Great Lakes. Third, short rivers in busy industrial sections where the consumer and producer are located near to each other. The best illustration of a river of this class is the Monongahela in Pennsylvania. This tonnage consists almost entirely of coal carried from mines on or near to the river to mills or furnaces at or near Pittsburgh. Fourth, minor streams at or near great cities or thickly populated areas. There are a number of these streams tributary to the waters around New York City, to the Delaware below Philadelphia, and to the Chesapeake Bay. In the case of these streams a market for the products of the locality tributary to the river in question is not far away and freight can profitably be carried in boats of shallow draft. Fifth, shallow streams of considerable length in the interior flowing through level areas which can be made available or improved for navigation at comparatively small cost by snagging. There are rivers of this type in North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana.

In a great majority of the cases mentioned it is clear that appropriations have brought excellent results. Whether the future may develop a movement of agricultural products for any considerable distance on the rivers is doubtful. The most objectionable improvements have been made in those streams of a depth not more than 12 feet which have to be improved by expensive locks and dams, though among these there have been exceptions, such as the Warrior River in Alabama, where I trust the results may justify the cost; also the Ohio and the Barge Canal, an artificial waterway across the State of New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield before he proceeds?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I notice that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] says that he has lost all hope of our carrying any part of the traffic by the rivers. I will ask the gentleman if he has examined the records and found that during the time the gentleman from Ohio was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors he introduced bills by which there was expended $170,000,000 in improvements of these very rivers?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, if I am in order, I said that no one was more enthusiastic than I up to a certain time when I made a more thorough study of the subject of rates and the development of waterways. I say further that there are certain inland waterways that do have a very considerable traffic.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman think it is a little bit late after expending $170,000,000 to learn that we are wrong, and will not the gentleman from Missouri tell us about the Mississippi as it is to-day?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, Mr. BURTON says river navigation is not practicable. There is one thing that I can not get through my head, and that is if river navigation is not practicable why are the railroads giving cutthroat rates up and down the river banks of the country all the time? [Applause.] Just tell me why it is that when the barge line was ready to begin operations this spring between St. Louis and Minneapolis the railroads came to Washington and got the Interstate Commerce Commission to permit them to put a rate on first-class freight from Minneapolis to St. Louis—586 miles—for $1.06, and then charged $1.44 for the same kind of freight, 86 miles less distance, from Minneapolis to Kansas City? It was because there was no river there. If river navigation is not practicable, why are they doing that? Everywhere you find any possibility of river development, you find cutthroat railroad rates.

There have been all sorts of controversies here about what the engineers have said and about what there is actually in the Treasury for river and harbor work. In order to settle that question I want to read the testimony of the engineers on this very question. General Taylor, Assistant Chief of Engineers, who has the rivers under his supervision, said before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. ANTHONY. About how much of these permanent appropriations will be carried over in the next fiscal year unexpended?

General TAYLOR. There will be practically nothing that is unexpended. On the 1st of December our actual unexpended balance was $28,324,247.89. Of that amount $9,774,165.13 was under contract, obligated, leaving us an obligated balance on the 1st of December of $18,550,082.76. We have been expending sums at the rate of about $2,500,000 a month.

On the 1st of December they had $28,000,000 in the Treasury, and $9,774,000 of that amount under contract, leaving $18,550,000 unobligated. Now, you can take the two and one-half million dollars a month, the amount they are spending, and figure it up, and you can see that there will be only $3,000,000 in the Treasury for river and harbor work July 1.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If the gentleman will give me a little more time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will grant the gentleman one minute in which to answer the question. General Taylor, in his testimony, stated, as the gentleman stated, that on December 1 there was $18,550,000 unobligated. On Saturday last, in response to a telephone call, he told me that on March 1 of this year there was $15,584,000 unobligated, and then what becomes of the two and one-half million dollars a month of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Let the gentleman take his own figures if he will. On March 1 there was $15,000,000 in the Treasury, and $2,500,000 a month for four months makes $10,000,000, leaving only $5,000,000 at most, and on the 1st of July next year we have to keep that much in the Treasury for emergencies. You can not spend it all.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And is not this the time of year, from March 1 to June 30, when they are doing work at the maximum of efficiency and at the maximum of progress, and will they not spend $3,000,000?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is true. Here is another thing that General Taylor said. There is no use having any controversy about what he said, because here is his testimony:

> Every bit of river and harbor work we do next year will be done with the money which is appropriated at this time. I want to make that very plain, that when the previous bills went through we had large sums which we could utilize for those years for which the appropriations were made, and that this year we have no money available to help out next year.
> I wish to again emphasize the fact that the Engineer Department has never stated or admitted that any sum less than the $42,000,000 would be sufficient for the next year for river and harbor work. The estimates have been cut down over our repeated recommendations, and we believe that more money is necessary.

I want to get this absolutely clear in your minds, because of the charges made by gentlemen on the floor of this House. I listened to what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said. I do not think there is anyone in the House whose record is any more regular than mine. He said on this question that the Budget stands or falls.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Can not the gentleman give me a little more time?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will yield to the gentleman some time later.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does that include the minute that I yielded to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TEN EYCK].

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. Chairman, when the majority leader from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was speaking I asked him to yield to me for a question and he refused. I wish now to ask him the same question I intended then to ask. When the time was being allotted the gentleman stated that he did not know why any time should be given to the minority side of the House, because, he stated, they are all in favor of this raid on the Treasury. I want to ask the gentleman now whether he is in favor of the legislation that the President of the United States recommended when he recommended several hundred millions expenditure in Canada on the canalization of the St. Lawrence River, without the territory of the United States? Does he consider this recommendation of the President a raid on the Treasury?

Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who has just preceded me, while a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and later chairman of that committee recommended through his committee an expenditure of more than $100,000,000 for improvement in extension of the rivers and harbors of this country, and is now purported to be an advocate of an expenditure of several hundred millions of dollars in the Dominion of Canada, without the territory of the United States, and in his speech here to-day opposed an increase in expenditure of approximately $15,000,000 upon the rivers and harbors within the territory of the United States.

I wish to ask the gentleman why on one hand he wishes to spend several hundred millions of dollars to help England and Canada and on the other hand refuses to vote for a small appropriation to help the American people and give to the farmers the much-needed relief in transportation through waterway improvement?

Mr. Chairman, my policy is American money for American waterways within the territory of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and resolutions of the following titles:

On March 13, 1922:

H. R. 10161. An act authorizing the use of special canceling stamps in certain post offices.

On March 20, 1922:

H. R. 10267. An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes;

H. R. 10663. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes;

H. R. 8193. An act to amend the first proviso in the act entitled "An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes," approved June 25, 1906; and

H. R. 9047. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to the town of Winthrop, Mass., a perpetual right of way over approximately 755 square feet of the Fort Banks Military Reservation for the purpose of widening Revere Street.

On March 21, 1922:

H. J. Res. 227. Joint resolution extending the term of the National Screw Thread Commission for a period of five years from March 21, 1922; and

H. R. 9597. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918.

On March 23, 1922:

H. R. 9235. An act providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for public park purposes.

On March 24, 1922:

H. R. 7881. An act to authorize the Governor of the Territory of Hawaii to ratify the agreements of certain persons made with the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii, and to issue land patents to those eligible under the terms of said agreements.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 14 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire in the outset to suggest that I think the argument made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York was a little unfair. He is opposed to it upon the ground that if we adopt this amendment we drive a team of horses through the vitals of the Budget system and that therefore it ought not to be adopted. I voted for the Budget Bureau because I believed it was a reform in the right direction. I am for the Budget now, but when I voted for it a year or so ago, and when I am for it now, I do not mean now, and I did not mean then, that I intended to surrender my right to my own judgment in a matter of appropriations recommended by the Budget. But if we desire to sustain the Bureau of the Budget on particular items there is very little reason to sustain it on the item now under consideration. General Dawes, the Director of the Budget, admitted that he knew very little or practically nothing about the item under consideration for rivers and harbors. When General Beach, the Chief of Engineers, sent out over the United States for the reports from the district engineers of the need for improvement of rivers and harbors they reported back to him a total of $63,000,000. General Beach went over each of these items and reduced the total amount requested from $63,000,000 to $42,000,000 and made that recommendation to the Secretary of War, which found its way to the Director of the Budget. He was about to recommend something like $13,500,000, which he seems to have arrived at not through any accurate information but by adding the appropriation of $12,000,000 for 1920 and $15,000,000 for 1921, making $27,000,000, and dividing that sum by two, resulting in the $13,500,000 he would have recommended at first.

But after those who had some information on the subject learned that he was about to recommend that pittance for the rivers and harbors of the Nation they went to him and to the Secretary of War and laid the facts before them, and then it was, and not until then, that the Director of the Budget increased the recommendation from $13,500,000 to $27,500,000, as carried in the bill now before us. Now, let us see what the facts are with reference to the work done by the War Department, through the Corps of Engineers, in the improvement of our rivers.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Is it not very likely that General Dawes added the $13,000,000 to the $42,000,000 and also divided that by two in his recommendation of $27,500,000?

Mr. BARKLEY. That may be perhaps true, but it would still bear out the statement that I make. What is the history of the last few years in the matter of river improvement? I am sorry the gentleman from Ohio, for whom I have a great deal of respect not only from an intellectual standpoint but from the standpoint of an American citizen, takes the attitude of such a doleful outlook in reference to the commerce of the rivers and harbors of the United States and opposes these needed appropriations. The gentleman from Ohio was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in this House for some 10 years. It was under his leadership that we adopted many of the projects which are about one-half completed and for which we are asking appropriations in the bill under consideration. [Applause.] After he ceased to be chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and was translated to another body he discovered all of a sudden that the policy that he had been advocating and under whose leadership we had adopted project after project is all wrong. How did he make that discovery? What new light did he see? He says he went to Europe and investigated. He should have learned that Europe utilizes her rivers.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does the gentleman think the argument of the gentleman from Ohio that we should not appropriate for the improvement of rivers and harbors because it would take some time to do the work is a sound argument?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think so, and I doubt very seriously if the gentleman from Ohio himself upon reflection would urge that argument as the reason for refusing this increase in the appropriation. Everybody knows that these improvements can not be made over night. But they ought to have been made much faster than they have been. Now, prior to the war we appropriated something like $35,000,000 per annum for all rivers and harbors.

When the war came on we practically ceased appropriating money for rivers and harbors except in sufficient amount merely to prosecute some of the work that had already been started. So for 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 it may be truthfully said that the amount spent in those four years would not exceed the amount which was expended in 1916 by a very large sum, and the reason we did so is that we were in a war, labor and material were high, and therefore Congress felt, in view of the fact that we were spending billions of dollars in the great enterprise of winning the war, that we should wait until the war was over before undertaking to pursue the policy which Congress has undertaken in the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BARKLEY. In 1920 we only appropriated $12,000,000; 1921, $15,000,000, both of which put together is not as much as we appropriated for one year prior to the war. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that during the war we only received about one-third of the amount for a day's work which we received previous to the war? So if we had appropriated $36,000,000 we would only receive about $12,000,000 worth of work?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. And that situation remains true now to a greater or less degree. Under this policy during the last four or five years the work has accumulated until the Chief of Engineers, through General Taylor and through the Corps of Engineers, has estimated and advised the Congress, through the executive department, that the very smallest amount that they can get along with without deterioration and without actual damage to the work is $42,500,000. Now, I dispute what the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Wisconsin say as to whether there may be a little unexpended balance on the 1st day of July. General Taylor, in charge of this work, testified emphatically that there would be probably nothing left on the 1st of July. The gentleman states there is now in the Treasury $15,000,000. Let us admit for the sake of argument——

Mr. MONDELL. There are actually $23,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are not actually $23,000,000 in the Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. On the first day of this month the gentleman said there were $23,000,000 in the Treasury, but some $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 is represented by contracts that are already out and for which money will be expended before the 1st of July. Let us see whether there are $15,000,000 unexpended in the Treasury now.

Mr. MONDELL. Twenty-three million dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are not $23,000,000 unobligated.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the report.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not what the Chief of Engineers says.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Fifteen million dollars on the 1st of March, if expended at the rate of $3,000,000 a month, would be gone the 1st of June.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not take the time to talk about all the rivers of the United States. There is one great river I desire to discuss that is typical of the situation that exists all over the country. That is the project of the canalization of the Ohio River. That river is a thousand miles long from the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers, 4½ miles south of Pittsburgh, to the mouth of the Ohio, where it empties into the Mississsippi at Cairo, Ill.

Now, in 1875, Congress began appropriating money for the improvement of the Ohio River, and the first lock and dam was completed in 1885. Since that time some 35 locks and dams have been built and are in operation, running from Pittsburgh on down the Ohio toward Cincinnati and toward its mouth in the Mississippi. There are 10 now under construction and 9 have not been begun. In 1905 Congress appointed a commission to investigate the improvement of the Ohio River for the purpose of making it a 9-foot stage all the year round, and after an exhaustive investigation and report of that commission Congress adopted a project making a 9-foot stage from Pittsburgh to Cairo by the construction of 54 locks and dams, and contemplated their completion by 1922. That year is now here. Under the report of that commission it is shown in 1905 that more than 10,000,000 tons of freight were being hauled on the Ohio River, even without the canalization, and notwithstanding that some portions of the river were capable of being navigated only four or five months out of the year.

There have been some 35 of these locks and dams completed; probably there may be one or two eliminated a little later. There are some eight or ten under construction, some of them not over half done, and some 80 or 90 per cent finished. Some of them have not been begun. And the testimony of the engineers is that if the appropriation of $5,000,000 a year, which was the amount allowed in the annual bill for the Ohio River prior to the war, is continued, it will require about six years to complete the canalization of that river.

What is the result of that on commerce? We have had a lot of talk about the transportation conditions. We passed here a year or two ago a bill known as the transportation act, by which we took out of the Federal Treasury millions of dollars and under which Congress instructed the Interstate Commerce Commission to make rates that would yield 6 per cent to the railroads, and I am glad I am one of those who voted against that bill. It has justified all my predictions about it, and has in some respects been even worse than many of us feared. I thought then, as we all know now, that such a policy would compel such increases in freight rates as to be a great handicap to commerce and industry and vastly increase the cost of living. Whatever may be said as to the wisdom or folly of such a policy, it can not be denied that the result has not been satisfactory either in stimulating traffic or in benefiting the public. Business has been stifled, transportation crippled, and the whole country now awaits impatiently the time when freight and passenger rates will come down.

This situation has made it necessary to consider with renewed interest and enthusiasm the question of resumption of traffic upon the Nation's great rivers. With rivers like the Ohio navigable for only a portion of the year, it has been and will be always difficult to induce capital to invest in river steamboats. But even with this handicap, during the last three years $31,000,000 have been invested in boats and barges on the Ohio River alone. If the river were completed with a 9-foot stage all the year from Pittsburgh to Cairo, there is no way to estimate the tremendous increase in river traffic, and the resulting increase in the amount of money invested in transportation facilities on our great rivers. The same is true of all the important streams of the country. We need more transportation in this Nation. The time is fast approaching when congestion of commerce and population will make it impossible for the railroads to carry all our freight. We must prepare the rivers to perform their duty in the great life of the Nation. We can not pepare for this need by a tight-fisted, miserly policy in dealing with these great arteries of trade. Therefore I favor the amendment increasing this appropriation to $42,800,000, and hope it will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated frequently in the press that the President of the United States is more popular in the country than the Congress and that the President of the United States has done more toward carrying out a constructive program than has the Congress. That may be because the Republican Congress will be up for election next time and the President will not be up for election until two years hence, and it is sought by the Democratic press to convince the Harding Republicans that they ought to vote for Democratic Congressmen. It may also be because it is easier to announce a program and to outline a program than it is to carry it out.

The Republican administration has announced a program of economy, and this controversy to-day illustrates the difficulties which the party has in actually crystallizing that program into legislation. We have a Budget law, written by a Republican Congress. We have the recommendation of the Budget Bureau in connection with these river and harbor improvements for $27,000,000, and now we have the attempt by our Democratic friends over here, who are almost solidly for the increase supported by some Republicans, to break over that economy program and add $15,000,000 to the amount recommended by General Dawes. It is not a question of whether we shall have improvement of rivers and harbors or whether we shall not have it. It is whether or not we are willing to accept this liberal provision made by the Budget Bureau and embraced in this bill reported by the Appropriations Committee or whether we are willing to enlarge that to meet the demands of a united number of Congressmen who want particular improvements to benefit the rivers and harbors which lie in their districts. That is a very worthy purpose on the part of a Congressman who has a river or harbor to be improved, because, of course, in many cases it would be of some benefit. But the problem of this Congress is to carry out a program of economy, notwithstanding the appeals that are made in the individual districts to the individual Congressmen.

The people of this country now pay the taxes by means of levies upon their incomes, and the people are crying out to have those taxes reduced, because the individuals paying the taxes feel the burden. And the Republican Congress must continue to respond to this insistent demand throughout the country for a program of economy. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], the able and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, says that unless this program is carried out we are going to have to meet a transportation situation with lack of cars and equipment on the railroads, and this, he says, is in the near future. Of course, that is answered by the proposition that the work which is proposed to be done by this additional $15,000,000 would not meet that situation, for it will not be done until the year ending July, 1923.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will be defeated and that the committee's proposition will be carried out.

Taxes are paid by our people. We are their Representatives. We must continue the work of reduction of the Government expenditures. It means eternal vigilance. Save a few millions here, a few millions there. Stop wasteful expenditures for every needless project, and the end of the year will show a real saving that the people will applaud. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I am no party to any combination or organization to pass this amendment. I am not certain whether I shall vote for it. The subject here, however, has been much clarified by two admissions made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. The first is that he brought about the present method of distribution of river and harbor appropriation, namely, the withholding from Congress its power to make these appropriations other than by a lump sum, leaving the allotment of that appropriation to the engineers of the Government. Second, his illuminating admission that he was mistaken in this method of allotments.

Now, I do not know that we can to-day bring about a reformation of this procedure, but this Congress will go very far in contributing to the economic efficiency of the American people and in reviving the confidence of the people in our legislative institution if it resumes its function of making specific appropriations. For I asseverate if the Congress takes its hands from the allotment of these appropriations the river and harbor improvements of America upon any wise policy are done for. The engineers are high and great men, but they deal with these matters mainly from one standpoint, while you and I, as Members of the House of Representatives, consider them from another point of view. The engineers deal with this question on the basis of mathematics. We must deal with it from the aspect of the economic and commercial possibilities of this Nation. For example, we here must consider the fact that rivers and harbors supply a great factor in determining the freight rates upon the railroads of this country. This is a far-reaching fact, not, perhaps, within the province of the engineers to consider or estimate in reaching their conclusions.

I would make another observation. I ask the Members of this House not to be carried away by the partisan appeal that by changing the recommendations of the Director of the Budget we thereby necessarily overthrow the Budget system.

I wish to direct your attention to the logic of this argument. If the recommendation of the Budget Commissioner is sacrosanct, then to raise the Budget estimate violates this contention as much so as to lower it. Now, the various committees of the House pride themselves in continuous boasts and declare that they have reduced the recommendations made by the Director of the Budget. If that is true, in logic you have overridden the director as much as if you increase the recommendation made in the Budget. But what is the function of the House? What is the individual right and duty of its Members? Can we abrogate our duty as legislators? Can we transfer our duty and our responsibility to the Director of the Budget? If so we should elect a director and adjourn, save to return and formally approve his findings, and thus affirm our indifference or our incompetency. We should at least hesitate to facilitate the decadence of the House, which an adoption of the argument advanced would declare. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the present Budget law was passed I think I did as much as any other man in the House to keep it from being passed, and I think that during the last Congress I made a number of five-minute speeches in which I made certain prophecies and tried to remedy certain methods of application. I want again to reiterate one of those propositions that I submitted to this House in the last Congress. You can not have a Budget system in toto unless you surrender the right to raise and lower the estimates that are submitted by the Budget Commissioner to this body. Nobody in the House is in favor of that kind of a Budget scheme or is in favor of the surrender of the right to appropriate the money to the executive department.

Now, I want to submit to the Republican Members of the House this basic principle: If this House by moral agreement does not put the estimate of the Budget Commissioner as the maximum, there is no virtue in the whole scheme.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield; I am sorry. Now, if we are going to have a Budget scheme and the majority side of the House is not going to feel it to be its moral duty not to exceed that estimate, the maximum of which has been set up by the Budget Commissioner, I want to know what merit there is in the whole proposition other than bunk to fool the American public?

Do not imagine you can bunco the public for very long without its knowing what you are doing. There is no violation of the principle of the scheme, when the Budget Commissioner sends down an estimate of $27,000,000 for a river and harbor proposition, if we want to reinvestigate the proposition and go over it and want to be responsible for the policy of the Government as to appropriations, to say we believe he has recommended too much and to cut it. In other words, the scheme will still hold intact if we leave a power lodged somewhere in the Government that morally binds us not to exceed the estimates of the Budget Bureau—not legally, because legally the Budget Commissioner can not do a thing in fixing the expenditures of this Government. The demand for a Budget system sprang up all over the country because it was charged, whether rightly or wrongly, that this body got its inspiration for appropriating money by appealing to the selfish interests of the individual congressional districts. There were few people in the Republican Party who had the courage to go on the stump last year and speak against the Budget in some form because of the universal demand for it in business circles and elsewhere that the Government shall conduct its business on a business basis. Mr.

Harding received great applause from the country when he announced in his inaugural speech that under his administration there would be more business judgment exercised in government and less meddling by the Government in business; but are we doing it when we see an organization in this body for the sole purpose of overriding the Budget estimate?

I say to you as a Republican there is not a man sitting on the Democratic side of the aisle that will not willingly and gladly and cheerfully appeal to the selfish interests of our side to get us to break down the thing that the American public look upon as the bulwark against extravagance in government. It is good Democratic politics to do it, as they can rightly claim that any good in the Budget has been nullified. Think it over, gentlemen. I have rivers and harbors in my district, and I would like to see money appropriated for their improvement; but I will say to you that before I go over the Budget estimate I want to try it out and see if I can not make my case strong enough with the Army engineers to get what is coming to my district.

I challenge the statement of my good friend from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] that freight does not move to-day because of inadequate railroads. Where is the congestion? We are building up every kind of transporting device that we can to compete with the railroads, and then we—the Republican Party—passed a law which provided that the railroads were entitled to an income of from 5½ per cent to 6 per cent on their total investment, which to-day requires a freight rate so high as to stifle business. There has not been any testimony offered to show that the prosperity of the country will be furthered by the increase of the fifteen millions proposed in this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. May I have one minute more?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, we are justified in increasing this appropriation above the amount recommended by the Budget. It grows out of the necessities of the situation. I believe that it is admitted by all concerned that transportation facilities in this country are inadequate.

It is also admitted that there are not going to be any new activities in railroad construction in the near future, and the only hope we have and the only resort is to the improvement of the inland waterways of the United States. If they are improved according to the plans of the Board of Engineers we shall be able to relieve the congested traffic, and that will be in the interest of economy and convenience for the entire public.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] seemed to be somewhat worried because there was some dispute in this country as to whether the President of the United States was more popular than his Congress. If he is, in my judgment it grows out of the fact that he is standing more solidly by the Republican platform. The Republican platform declared for improved waterways to meet the necessities of this country in the way of transportation.

The Democratic platform makes a like declaration and declares that the railroad and other transportation facilities of this country are inadequate and that improvement of our rivers and harbors is imperative. If either party lives up to its platform declarations, it will be in favor of the continued improvement of our inland waterways and harbors. The action of the Budget in recommending the $27,000,000 is not binding on the Congress, and as I understand is not intended to be binding on the Congress. If we must abide absolutely by the maximum appropriation recommended by the Budget, then contrary to the understanding and belief of many of its Members this Congress has absolutely surrendered all of its power to increase appropriations. The recommendation of the Budget Bureau is its judgment upon the facts and information before that body. If that recommendation to the Congress does not meet the judgment of this House after due consideration, I would be much surprised, and I am sure the American people would be much surprised to know that Congress has placed itself where it can not exercise its judgment in relation to appropriations in respect to such an important matter as this. I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that there is no item upon which we are to act in this bill which is of more importance to the agricultural and commercial interests of this country than this item for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the United States in order to make possible the transportation of the products of the farm and the factory to the markets of the world. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] ought to be adopted. It reflects the judgment of those who have the opportunity to know the facts; those whose training and experience and whose intimate association with every phase of this important problem enable them to advise and recommend intelligently and definitely.

In this connection the Chief of Engineers, after a careful review of the present requirements for existing projects, submitted an estimate of $63,000,000 as the amount necessary in order to prosecute the work in a businesslike way. He also submitted an estimate of $42,000,000 as the minimum, the sum absolutely essential in order to avoid abandonment and loss on important works and improvements already under construction. Failure to appropriate the minimum would result in loss of expenditures already made.

We have spent vast sums for the building and operation of an American merchant marine and will continue to make appropriations in order to provide adequate facilities for carrying the products of our farms and factories to all parts of the world in American-owned ships sailing under the American flag. It is proposed that these ships shall sail from every American port. But in order to make this enterprise successful provision must be made for the transportation of our products to the ports from which these ships sail. Recent investigations have shown that it is of the highest importance that agricultural products especially be moved at the proper time. Several billion dollars have been lost by the farmers of the United States within the last two years on account of congested traffic.

The most important feature of river traffic just at this time is the operation by the War Department of the barge line service on the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers. With an inferior and improper equipment and the lack of adequate terminal facilities this operation during the last 14 months showed a net profit of $250,000. I favor the continuation of this service and the extension of the same to the main tributaries of the Mississippi. It affords an additional outlet to the markets of the world at very reasonable freight charges for all the products of the Mississippi Valley.

If our railroads can secure the needed funds several years will be required in order to provide the equipment and make the improvements necessary to meet the transportation needs of the country, if they are ever able to do so. In the meantime and in order to provide proper shipping facilities and insure competition for the future it is of the highest importance that our inland waterways be improved as rapidly and adequately as possible.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] to use some of his time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been in Congress I have agreed with the floor leader on every occasion, I think, when it came to voting, except where our opinions disagreed. This is one of the times when we disagree. There is such a thing as a standing committee in this House known as the Rivers and Harbors Committee. I would like to ask the unbiased judgment of this House as to what that committee is worth if after sitting day after day and week after week and month after month, compiling information on this subject, we are to subject that information to the Bureau of the Budget, when the head of that Budget Bureau came before our committee and admitted frankly that he did not know a single thing about rivers and harbors?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. No; I have only four minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not found that statement in the hearings before the gentleman's committee.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield. Notwithstanding the declaration of my friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], which seems to involve the entire abandonment of rivers and harbors as a national interest, we had in addition to our own long days of work the benefit of the knowledge of that corps that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] himself said were the blue-ribbon functionaries of this Government, the engineers of the War Department. Now, gentlemen, the engineers of the War Department, scattered all over this country, stationed here and there in every spot where there is a particular project, have made returns in response to the demand of General Taylor and General Beach as to what they needed. Their reply was $62,000,000. Then, again, when on account of the exigencies of the Treasury they were asked to cut down their estimates to the very lowest amount consistent with good business, they cut them down to $42,800,000. Now, that was our official information. Gentlemen come here and state that they have just called up somebody over the phone, or that they have just had some information over the phone about this, that, and the other, when, as a matter of fact, our hearings are the written record where men have given their testimony, and it goes down in black and white, and it binds them. I submit that if General Taylor or any other man connected with the Federal Government has made a statement that differs from the hearings as to any point, he should have informed the chairman of this committee to that effect.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The Chief of Engineers reported that they had on hand $23,000,000, of which $8,000,000 was obligated, leaving $15,000,000, and that the $15,000,000 will all be used by the 30th of June.

Mr. LAYTON. If you will look at the record you will find that I asked General Taylor that question myself specifically, how much he would have on hand at the end of this fiscal year, judging from the method of expenditure that was going on, and he said practically there would be nothing left. Now, gentlemen, I want to say to you frankly that I rather think we ought to pay some attention to their recommendations.

[By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. BARKLEY, to Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, and to Mr. MONTAGUE to extend their remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] use some of his time?

Mr. SISSON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it seems that the main ground for the opposition by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the Republican leader of the House, to this amendment is that if it is adopted it would break down the Budget system. I ask the gentleman, upon reflection, is that true? I remember very well when the "late lamented" and much "Republican beloved" Will H. Hays, late Postmaster General of the United States, who said that he had "humanized," and I am sure had desoldiered the employees of the Post Office Service of the United States, made his recommendation to abolish the village delivery service throughout the United States and thereby do away with mail deliveries in these small towns, the subcommittee on appropriations who had charge of that bill paid no attention to his recommendation and brought in the regular appropriation for village delivery, which was adopted by this House. I remember that we have right recently passed an appropriation bill appropriating $1,500,000 for seed for the farmers of the Northwest, which the gentleman from Wyoming, the economy leader of to-day, was very much in favor of, and they never even consulted the Budget Bureau at all about that appropriation. The act as originally passed in the Senate appropriated $5,000,000. It came here and was amended to appropriate $1,000,000. Then it went into conference, and as finally adopted appropriated $1,500,000 for seeds for the farmers of the Northwest, which is practically a gift, and that was done without consulting the Budget Committee at all.

I am one who believe that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has the best conception of geography when he comes to talk about economy of appropriations of any man in the House.

Why, take his own State of Wyoming; since 1912 in two irrigation projects exclusively in Wyoming there has been appropriated $6,565,000, and a bill is pending in the Senate to-day where they are asking—and I presume the gentleman from Wyoming is enthusiastically in favor of it—for $2,150,000 additional appropriation for the two irrigation projects exclusively in the gentleman's district in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman realize the difference between making a river and improving one? [Laughter.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. I think the gentleman from Wyoming has a good conception of that when he talks about economy on this proposition. If we are to adhere absolutely to the recommendations of the Budget Commission, we are placed in the position where we are simply rubber stamps, and we can not increase or decrease the appropriations recommended by the Budget Committee without destroying it. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], chairman of the subcommittee, this morning admitted, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Wyoming, that they had decreased several recommendations of the Budget Committee in this bill. If Congress is going to take the position simply because we have a Budget Committee that recommends a certain amount that we can not increase or decrease those amounts, then we had better turn the functions of the American Congress over to the Budget Committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Who ever suggested—and when and where—that we ought not to decrease the Budget estimate?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have no objection to decreasing the Budget estimate in a proper case.

Mr. MONDELL. Who suggested that we ought not to decrease it?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am for a decrease when it is meritorious, but I claim that every Member of Congress should act on his own individual responsibility and judgment as to whether he will increase the estimate or decrease it. They admit in this that they were in error when they recommended at first $13,000,000 and then increased it to $27,000,000.

The only information the Budget Committee had when it first recommended $13,000,000 for rivers and harbors for the next fiscal year was the fact that the last Republican Congress had appropriated about this amount. It would have stood by that recommendation except for the fact that those of us who are in favor of river and harbor appropriation and are familiar with the history of it prevailed upon the Budget Committee to increase it, and it finally agreed to increase the amount to $27,635,260. It arbitrarily fixed this amount notwithstanding the office of the Chief of Army Engineers made a report showing that the amount of $42,815,661 was the least amount that could be appropriated for the next fiscal year to carry on this work.

The greatest thing that this Republican administration could do for the people would be to lower the freight rates of the country, but I know and you know that this administration is not going to do that at this session of Congress, and the only other way to reduce freight rates is to have navigable rivers to carry the freight in competition with the railroads. You will always find the railroad interests of the country doing everything it can against the appropriation for rivers and harbors because navigable rivers make the railroads reduce their rates, and wherever in this country there are navigable rivers you will find the railroad interests in that locality coming before the Interstate Commerce Commission and begging it for permission to lower its freight rates in order to enter into competition with the freight rates of those rivers.

In 1910 Congress established a policy of making a 9-foot channel in the Ohio River. Every Democratic Congress from that time always appropriated at least $27,000,000 for rivers and harbors, but as soon as the Republicans got control of Congress and the Government they cut this appropriation down to about $13,000,000 each year. By reason of the liberal appropriations of the Democratic Congress there has always been at the end of each fiscal year an unexpended balance to carry on these various river projects, but by reason of the false economy of the subsequent Republican Congress in refusing the appropriations for rivers and harbors, the unexpended balances have been exhausted, and if this amendment making an appropriation of $42,815,661 for the next fiscal year is not adopted there will not be a dollar of unexpended balance at the end of this fiscal year and, therefore, practically all of the $27,635,260 recommended in this bill will be spent for harbor improvement and none of it for rivers. If Congress would appropriate sufficient money to complete the 9-foot channel in the Ohio River, which it should do, that river would be one of the greatest waterways of commerce in the world. The Ohio River flows through a great, rich, agricultural country, densely populated and with great industrial cities along its banks almost from its source to its mouth.

I believe in economy in the expenditure of the people's money, but I think a failure to provide appropriations for rivers and harbors is a false economy and that the taxpayers of the country are the ones who suffer. Therefore, I appeal to every Member of this House to support the pending amendment in order that this great work may continue during the next fiscal year.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Middle West, which is the economic food-producing section of this country, is paralyzed at the present time on account of the expensive freight rates on the marketing of their produce. That high rate is on what they have to sell. They are also paralyzed by reason of the Pittsburgh plus rate on many articles they have to buy. There is only one hope, and that is to have a reduction in the cost of transportation. In my judgment, if the Mississippi River could be made a transportation stream it will carry the whole produce of the Mississippi Valley to New Orleans and across the seas. Forty-four per cent of the industrial productions transported out of the country are produced west of Pittsburgh, east of the Rocky Mountains, and north of the Arkansas and Tennessee line. Ninety per cent of the food exports of this country are produced west of Pittsburgh, east of the Rocky Mountains, and north of the Arkansas and Tennessee line. Does it mean anything to the Middle West whether or not you can put our produce on barges and send it down the Mississippi Valley and across the ocean? I want to say that that is something that ought to be looked forward to. Why? Because under our present railroad system of to-day they demand, and I guess we will have to concede some of their claims, that they can not reduce rates to where the present production can stand the rates at the present time. We have got to find some method by which we can pull the great food-producing section of the country out of this paralysis now and permit it to regain its economic equilibrium. How can we do it? I want to say that the first thing to do is to permit that section of the country to have water transportation. Why? Because of the preferential rate given by the Interstate Commerce Commission to all points that have water competition.

What will it mean? It will mean that the Middle West will get a route by which it can deliver its produce to the market and will not be compelled to pay excessive rates which they are now paying, all of which comes out of the producer of foodstuffs and of raw materials. We find that this administration has recommended that we give $30,000,000 a year for ship subsidy, to carry exports across the ocean, but we are producing almost half of our industrial and food exports, and yet you do not want to give us a few million dollars to get that produce down to the ocean, where we can ship it across. [Applause.] You say that we ought not to do this now, that this appropriation is sufficient. What does it mean if you do not give us this addition? It simply means that the great commerce coming into and going out of this country will go to the harbors that will receive the benefits of the appropriation if it is reduced, because the most important projects will receive first consideration.

I want $2,000,000 of this money expended north of St. Louis, between there and Minneapolis, because you are tapping the great food-producing section of the country, and that is what you ought to do. We ought to have this transportation, because if we do not produce the food somebody is not going to eat. Why, bless your heart, the great State of Massachusetts produced enough wheat to feed its people for one day, and the rest of the year they would not have any bread if it was not for some of the other sections of the country. The great State of Massachusetts that we have heard so much about produces enough pork to feed its people 23 days.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The State of Massachusetts runs rather to the production of politicians than food, does it not?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not have the required information to answer your question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware that in the apportionment of the appropriations by the Chief of Engineers only $40,000 goes to New England whereas $2,000,000 goes to the improvement of the Mississippi?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes; but does the gentleman realize that in the Geodetic Survey for which we just made appropriations in the independent offices appropriation bill we are making appropriations of $7,000,000 to sweep all of this coast and fix it up so that they will have a lighthouse on every rock?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but we are talking about the present bill and not some other bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. I contend that the pending amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, much has been said about economy. I deny that this meager appropriation, the parsimony of this river and harbor item of the bill, is economy. When we appropriate such small amounts as this it means that we are allowing the channels and the harbors of the country to silt up and shoal. I know that to be the fact. In the case of Baltimore the channel leading to the harbor through the Patapsco River has been so neglected in the last few years that we do not begin to have the depth which we formerly had and which we so desire to maintain. Much has been said as to a balance from the appropriation of last year. There is no question in my mind as to the accuracy of just how much money there is left from that of last year's appropriation. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] spoke of some $15,000,000 balance, which is wholly incorrect. I note on page 97, part 2, of the hearings on this bill Mr. ANTHONY asks this question of General Taylor, Chief of Engineers:

> Can you state how much money, in addition to the $15,000,000 appropriated last year, was available for river and harbor work this year?
> Yes. The unexpended balance on March 1, 1921, just prior to the enactment of the river and harbor act, was $37,565,000. In other words, we had an appropriation, with the $15,000,000, of something over $52,000,000 for expenditure during the current fiscal year.
>
> Mr. ANTHONY. How much of that was allotted during the current year?
> General TAYLOR. We have allotted all but about $200,000. We have a balance of approximately $203,000.

Again, on page 109, in answer to a question by Mr. SISSON, General Taylor said:

> Our available balance will be nil, absolutely. We must depend entirely upon this appropriation for all the work we are going to do next year.
>
> Mr. ANTHONY. In other words, you are working at such speed that you will use up all the money which you had on hand at the beginning of this fiscal year?
> General TAYLOR. Yes. In other words, we have worked all of the surplus off.

This, then, Mr. Chairman, is conclusive proof that the only money we will have to expend on rivers and harbors is $27,635,260, the amount carried in this bill, unless we increase the appropriation to $42,815,661, as provided by the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

I deplore the parsimony being exercised by the Committee on Appropriations regarding river and harbor improvements. The engineer's office of the War Department, after figuring as low as possible commensurate with keeping our channel work at least progressing and maintaining that which has already been performed, asked for $42,815,661, and from this has been lopped off some $15,000,000, leaving but $27,635,260 for construction and maintenance during the next fiscal year.

It is not economy to allow your harbors to silt up shoal, reducing the depth which has been attained. It always costs far more after such condition than it would to maintain the work and keep it at the standard depth at all times.

No country, even during the war, neglected its internal improvements because of the expense of the war, and certainly no country is justified in neglecting them during the reconstruction period. The city of Baltimore has shown its faith in the future by a huge terminal and port plan which will cost the city more than $50,000,000. They do not ask the Government to do more than to cooperate in this broad and comprehensive improvement. They only ask that the Government shall keep its channels to this magnificent harbor in good shape and maintain the standard depth of 35 feet. This can not be done if we are but to appropriate 60 per cent of what is actually required according to the figures of the engineers of the War Department.

I am as much in favor of economical expenditures by the Government as anyone, but I can not comprehend how we can figure this 60 per cent appropriation to be economy when we know the vast waste which is taking place by lack of maintenance—when we realize that when business revives those benefits derived from the great improvements to the various cities and through them to the country will be of inestimable benefit to the entire people in efficiency and reduction of freight rates.

General Black, when Chief of Engineers, said that Baltimore was destined to become the great harbor of the Atlantic seaport, and certainly the authorities of my city have a faith in that prediction. The low cost of labor and lighterage at the Baltimore Harbor, the proximity of our city to the Central West, and the differential in its favor, the nearest great seaport to the Panama Canal, closer to the western coast of South America than San Francisco itself, Baltimore is destined for great things. Our people know this and are willing to back their opinion with their money.

The comprehensive improvements, costing more than $50,000,000, will give to Baltimore eight piers at McComas Street Terminals of 1,200 feet long and 250 feet wide, capable of providing berths for 33 ocean-going steamers of 12,000 tons each, and with space for 20 warehouses and 2,500 freight cars. Those to be constructed on the Patapsco Flats, consisting of five piers of the same length and width, and providing berths for 23 ocean-going steamers of 12,000 tons and with space for 20 warehouses and 4,000 freight cars. In addition to this, the large piers on the Canton Co. property will be enlarged. Grain elevators will be erected. All improvements and construction will be made in the most substantial manner, and with the primary object of procuring the greatest possible benefit to the port as a whole, and, secondly, with an eye single to efficiency and cheapness of operation.

Baltimore to-day has the model immigration station of this country provided for her by Congress, and when this work is completed it will have the model port of the world. Every improvement tending to efficiency will be incorporated in the work. Our hearts and our money are in the enterprise, and what we ask of the Government is to discontinue the parsimony which is now being exercised and to adopt that policy which will maintain the standard depth and continuance of the work which has been projected. The policy adopted by the committee is false economy and wasteful in the extreme.

To-day Baltimore, with this great improvement under way, has but $295,000 to its credit, $147,000 of which is now covered by contract, leaving but $147,000 balance. Why, gentlemen, this amount would not begin to put the neglected channels in proper shape much less continue the new construction. Very little has been spent for maintenance for several years past, and this is rapidly injuring the general improvements not only of Baltimore but of the country at large.

The development of our country depends largely upon the development of our ports, and certainly should not be neglected even by a Congress which is trying to practice the strictest economy.

Nor should too great congestion be allowed to exist in any one city. It is better policy to develop our seaports by adequate channels and encourage the equipment of harbors as fast as possible. Baltimore has expended heretofore on her harbor more than $13,000,000, and this new plan will speed development in every direction. Our port is nearer to the great centers of population back of the Atlantic seaboard than is New York, Philadelphia, and other ports. One can scarcely realize that Baltimore is nearer St. Louis than New York by 200 miles, and 63 miles closer than Philadelphia; that it is 109 miles closer to Chicago than is New York, and 118 miles closer to Indianapolis; that it is closer to Detroit, and even closer to Buffalo, N. Y., than is New York City itself. A circular presented me, fully itemized, shows that a ship of 5,165 tons can be handled in the port of Baltimore cheaper by $4,177.81 than in the port of New York.

Another circular shows the difference in cost of a shipment from Pittsburgh to Baltimore or New York in which every item is given, and shows a saving in favor of Baltimore of 19.7 per cent. Another circular shows same shipment, via warehouse, and depicts a saving through Baltimore of 47 per cent. Why, then, shall we adhere to congested centers when others are just as efficient?

BALTIMORE PORT TERMINAL PLANS—POLICY CALLS FOR MORE THAN 29 PIERS FROM $50,000,000 LOAN—EACH SIDE OF HARBOR IN NEWEST PROGRAM—WAREHOUSE AND RAIL FREIGHT YARD SPACE IS PROVIDED FOR.

[From the Baltimore Sun, March 20, 1922.]

Plans for the expenditure of the $50,000,000 harbor-improvement loan were made public last night by the port development commission.

Briefly summarized, the principal projects, subject to modification as conditions and the needs require, are:

1. A series of eight piers, designated as the McComas Street Terminals, each 1,200 feet long and 250 feet wide, capable of providing berths for 33 ocean-going steamers of 12,000 tons each, and with space for 20 warehouses and 2,500 freight cars.

2. Filling in of the Patapsco Flats and the construction there of five piers, each 1,200 feet long by 300 feet wide, providing berths for 23 ocean-going steamers of 12,000 tons each, and with space for 20 warehouses and 4,900 freight cars.

3. Development either by the commission or the railroads of eight large piers on the Canton Co.'s property near Riverview, and as many more at the terminals of the Pennsylvania Railroad in Canton, together with smaller projects at scattered points.

The first two projects, upon which the interest of the commission is centered principally, are on the west side of the harbor in the Spring Gardens area. The McComas Street Terminals alone, if developed on the tentative lines laid down, by 1940 would more than double the present berthing facilities of the port and, when completed, in conjunction with existing terminals, would provide, in the judgment of the commission, "ample facilities for the anticipated increase in Baltimore's commerce for approximately 20 years."

OTHER WORK INCLUDED.

* * * In addition to the projects above outlined the improvement of the present municipal piers, the improvement of the Hughes Street property owned by the city, and some work on the eastern side of the harbor will require all of the $50,000,000 which the city is authorized to borrow. * * *

It is proposed to concentrate first on the McComas Street project. The city owns a big block of property there, and will have to acquire other property to carry out the scheme as shown.

* * * * * * *

PLANS FOR PATAPSCO GROUP.

In order to carry out the plan for the Patapsco group on the mud islands behind the Hanover Street bridge and on the proposed fill in front of the bridge, it will be necessary to confine the channel of the Patapsco River where it overflows the mud islands and flats to the present south shore and also to acquire the property of the Arundel Corporation or compensate that corporation for the practical loss of its water frontage, the layout as planned cutting off that property entirely from development for pier purposes.

* * * * * * *

WORKING POLICY OUTLINED.

The policy of the commission, according to its announcement, will be this:

(1) All improvements of a permanent nature will be undertaken primarily with the object of securing the greatest possible benefit to the port as a whole, and secondarily for the purpose of meeting the immediate requirements of lessees. Stability as well as economy of construction and provision for speedy and economical operation are considered essential and consistent with the ultimate object of unification of the control and operation of all terminals and their connection with the trunk railroad lines serving the port.

WILL PREPARE DETAILS.

(2) Detailed plans and specifications for extensive improvements will be prepared and the work of construction will be undertaken by the commission for lessees. Lessees desiring the commission to execute work in accordance with plans and specifications prepared by the lessees may so arrange, provided these plans and specifications receive the written approval of the commission before any work is started.

(3) The commission will consider the application of a prospective lessee for the improvement or construction of wharves, docks, piers, warehouses, and all facilities in connection with the operation and use of same, located in any part of the harbor, provided the proposed improvements are consistent with the policy of the commission.

CITY TO ACQUIRE TITLE.

(4) No work of construction will be started on any property until the city shall have acquired title to the property and until the mayor and city council of Baltimore, with the approval of the board of estimates, shall have entered into a binding contract with the lessee covering a period of not less than 10 years, secured to the satisfaction of said board. * * *

Should the construction or improvement be upon or appurtenant to land or other property now owned by the city, the appraised value of such land or other property shall be included as part of the cost of construction or improvement.

IMPROVEMENT OF PIERS.

Methods of improving existing municipal piers for coastwise service and for light-draft ocean carriers are given. These piers are the one at the foot of Broadway and Piers 5 and 6 on Pratt Street. This work, it is shown, would be comparatively inexpensive.

* * * * * * *

SCHEME FOR HUGHES STREET.

As for the Hughes Street property, which has a water front of 1,000 feet with a depth of water of 14 feet, it is stated that the plan for development embraces the rebuilding of the bulkhead, the dredging of a channel to a connection with the present channel in front of the American Sugar Refinery, and the construction of a cold storage or local water front industrial plant or the construction of marginal transfer sheds and warehouses for coastwise carrier service.

* * * * * * *

DISCUSSES M'COMAS TERMINAL.

In discussing the McComas terminal the commission has this to say:

"The city owns about 2,400 feet of water front south of McComas Street, which is sufficient for the construction of at least two modern piers without encroaching upon the adjoining property. The commission believes it will be for the best interests of the port and the city for it to take a broad view of the situation and plan for this most desirable water front a terminal which will compare favorably as to capacity and equipment with any terminal group in the world.

"In order to construct such a terminal at this admirable location a large concentrated ocean terminal with ample transfer sheds, warehouses, tracks, and streets—one which will tie up with future yard and terminal developments of the Baltimore & Ohio on the north and east and the Western Maryland on the west, which will meet the requirements of commerce for years to come, which will be in thorough harmony with the complete development of the port as a whole, with the contemplated unification of control and operation, the belt line extension and improvements—in fact, in order to make the McComas terminal one which will be a real worth-while development it should cover the entire water front from the Western Maryland Railway terminal on the west to Fort McHenry on the east over a distance of about 4,800 feet.

WILL BE OF MODERN TYPE.

"It is intended that every feature of this development shall be of the most modern type, economical in operation, requiring the least possible shifting of cars, the speediest release of vessels and cars, and the freest flow of freight between transfer sheds and the warehouses. Each pier with its supporting warehouses, tracks, and driveways will be a separate unit, capable of being operated independently of any other unit, and all units are so coordinated that they can be operated at the same time under either group or unit control.

"The terminal when completed in accordance with this plan will have eight piers, 250 feet wide and 1,200 feet long, with 300 feet slips between them. It will have 25 warehouses from one to five stories in height, each connected with the upper deck of a pier transfer shed by means of a covered way. There are ample yard tracks located between the warehouses which connect with the extension of the Harbor Belt Railroad along McComas Street, which in turn will connect with the Baltimore & Ohio and Western Maryland roads on the west. There will be 80-foot driveways between the warehouses connecting with a 100-foot driveway along the bulkhead in front of the piers, which will have an outlet to Fort Avenue and to the Key Highway by means of subways or bridges, which will eliminate grade crossings in the approaches to the terminal.

GRAIN ELEVATOR INCLUDED.

"By a modification of the layout of tracks and warehouses a suitable space may be provided for the construction of a modern grain elevator so designed that it may be served by gravity and deliver the grain to ships moored at the adjacent piers by means of conveyors and chutes. The plan also is sufficiently flexible to permit of the substitution of industrial or manufacturing plants in place of some of the warehouses, and the fencing off of a portion of the terminal so that this portion could be used as a free port.

"The capacity of this terminal is indicated by the following data:

"Area of piers, 2,400,000 square feet.

"Area of transfer sheds, 1,760,000 square feet.

"Area of warehouses, first floor only, 760,200 square feet.

"Car capacity, 2,500 cars.

DESCRIBES BERTHING SPACE.

"The piers will furnish berthing space for 32 large ocean cargo carriers of more than 12,000 dead-weight tonnage and with a length of between 500 and 600 feet. The marginal wharf on the west will accommodate an additional vessel, making 33 berths, which will give more than twice the present berthing capacity of this port for large general cargo carriers."

* * * * * * *

ADVANTAGE OF PATAPSCO FLATS.

In connection with the proposed development of the Patapsco Flats the commission states that the chief advantages of this location are the low costs of acquiring title, its large area available for railroad tracks and warehouses, its proximity to the city when completed, and the necessity, because of its shape, of maintaining thereon only a minimum of streets and tracks.

"The commission," it is announced, "has adopted the plan of development which contemplates the reclamation of 150 acres between the proposed bulkhead and Hanover Street, upon which will be constructed warehouses or water-front industries, with splendid service yards and the necessary driveways, five piers 300 feet wide and 1,200 feet long, and a marginal wharf of about 2,500 feet. The service yards can be connected with the Baltimore & Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroads on the southeast and with the Harbor Belt Railroad and Western Maryland Railway on the northwest.

"In addition to the land reclaimed between the bulkhead and Hanover Street the flats southwest of Hanover Street can be used as dumping ground for dredged material, which will be suitable eventually for an industrial development, covering 160 acres. It will take years for the completion of this improvement. When completed the five piers will provide berths for 20 large ocean carriers, over 12,000 tons dead weight each and with a length of between 500 and 600 feet, and 3 vessels of similar type along the marginal wharfs, making a total of 23 berths. The pier area will be 1,800,000 square feet and the covered-shed area on the piers 1,437,500 square feet.

"The plans show the possibility of constructing 20 warehouses which would have an area of 1,235,200 square feet on the first floor alone. The tracks will take care of about 4,900 cars. The completion of this terminal as planned in addition to the McComas terminal and the existing railroad terminals will provide berthage for 67 large general ocean cargo carriers, or about four and a half times the capacity of the port as it was in 1920."

* * * * * * *

TAKES UP BELT-LINE SITUATION.

In discussing the belt-line situation the commission goes on record in favor of the construction by the railroads of a line outside the city, such as the Pennsylvania Railroad was forbidden by the legislature some years ago to build. On this subject the commission states:

"All through traffic between Philadelphia, New York, and New England on the one hand and the South and West on the other passes through the tunnels in the heart of the city. To relieve the tunnels of this vast volume of through traffic and to make suitable railroad interchange movements between the piers of one carrier and the rails of another an outer belt line should be built by the railroads, tapping all the freight tracks before the tracks enter the congested parts of the city.

"This outer belt line, which at the same time could be made to act as a detour line, with the classification yards and its branches connecting the harbor belt line and the terminals along the water front, will enable any car loaded at any pier to travel over the belt-line system to any one of the railroad trunk lines entering the port. According to Professor McElwee, the first law of a port is that there must be physical connection between every pier and every railway and every warehouse, with a uniform system of charges. This law can be met by a belt-line system as described."

* * * * * * *

PROVIDES FOR CHANGES.

The commission concludes the statement of its plan as follows:

"The commission has endeavored to form a comprehensive plan for the development of the port—a plan which utilizes to their maximum extent the railroad systems reaching our water front, which will permit of a 'physical connection between every pier and every railroad and every warehouse with a uniform system of charges' and which will make the operations of the port adaptable to unification of control at the proper time. It realizes that any plan which it adopts must be flexible enough to admit of changes from time to time as the future needs of the harbor may require.

"While the commission has shown large developments on the middle branch of the Patapsco River and on the Canton shore, it does not intend to convey the impression that these locations are the only parts of the harbor which are suited for development as ocean terminals. It will consider the construction of harbor facilities at any point in the harbor that a lessee may desire, provided such work is consistent with the policy of the commission as hereinbefore outlined. It is not the purpose of the commission to interfere with any improvements of the harbor by any firm or corporation. * * *

"The development of the port in accordance with this plan will consume the $50,000,000 authorized by the enabling act and will take care of the anticipated increase in commerce for many years.

INTENSE COOPERATION NEEDED.

"Back of the development of our port there must be an intense and aggressive cooperation of the business and improvement organizations and of all of our citizens, who should strive toward the promotion of every activity that will tend to stimulate the flow of business to our port and stand ready at all times to oppose that which may in anywise check or interfere with that flow."

SUMMARY OF PORT PLANS.

A. A working policy which will govern the activities of the commission.
B. The possible improvements of existing municipal piers so as to make them serviceable for coastwise carriers.
C. Acquisition and improvement of privately owned piers so as to make them serviceable for ocean cargo carriers.
D. Construction of a cold storage or water from industrial plant on the city's wharf at Hughes Street.
E. An ocean terminal on McComas and adjoining properties.
F. Development of the Patapsco Flats as an ocean terminal, or for water-front industries.
G. Other water-front projects.
H. Dredging channels and anchorage areas.
I. Improvement and extension of the Harbor Belt Railroad.
K. Construction of an outer belt railway.
L. Unification of the control and operation of the port.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Can the gentleman from New York yield me two minutes more?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am sorry, but I have not the time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Then I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I think the most important national question that is before the people of this country is the question of the transportation of freight. Two years ago when the transportation question was before Congress the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce considered the question all summer and reported its recommendations to the House. There was included in the transportation act the following language, and I do not think there is a member of the committee, and but very few Members of the House, who did not give his whole-hearted support and approval to this particular language. Quoting now from section 500 of the interstate commerce act:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

That is a solemn declaration of the Congress of the United States.

It is either something serious or it is pure hypocritical bunk, and it is up to the Congress to say which it is. I want to say to gentlemen on the floor to-day there is a plan that has been going on in this country for years, and it has been gaining headway, absolutely to kill off water transportation, and the railroads of the country are at the bottom of it; and there are Members of Congress who are allowing themselves to be used to carry it on. They may not be doing it consciously, but they are allowing themselves to be so used. The railroads are going to kill water transportation if they can do so, and you may as well become reconciled to it. [Applause.] Now, we have got to make up our minds whether we are going to allow ourselves to be used for the furtherance of this program; and in order to overcome the opposition to that program, whenever some of us get up here and try to give vitality to this provision of the transportation act by making sufficient appropriations to go ahead with the improvements of the rivers, what are we met by? The majority leader starts a big hue and cry about economy and about assaulting the Budget; and he passes it on to others, who raise the same clamor. It is all bunk. If Congress can not exercise its own judgment upon these recommendations, why, let us repeal the Budget law. [Applause.]

I am in favor of economy as much as Mr. MONDELL or any other Member of the House. But it is false economy to cut off appropriations that will stop river and harbor improvements. There will never be any material relief from the high cost of transportation in this country until we get water transportation. Improve the rivers, allow capital to invest in effective water transportation, bring about real competition with the railroads, and we will eventually bring about a general reduction in all the freight rates of the country. This amendment ought to carry, and the improvements of our waterways ought to continue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment to increase the appropriations contained in this bill for rivers and harbors from $27,000,000 to $43,000,000, in round numbers. It appears from reliable data and information which I have obtained from the War Department and Chief of Engineer's office that the latter amount will be absolutely necessary to properly carry on the work of opening up our rivers for navigation, and I want to briefly call attention to some of the facts showing the tremendous importance of adopting this amendment in order that such work may go forward. My position in this House has been for rigid economy, but not for false economy. The question that is to-day confronting the people of this country is a solution of the transportation problems and of securing a means by which property can be transported without confiscating the major portion of it to pay high and exorbitant transportation charges. This proposition goes to the very foundation of our Government and affects the agricultural and various business industries of our country all alike. My answer is that it can be solved only by the buildling of national highways and in making the great rivers of this country suitable for navigation. This amendment, if adopted, will be a start in this direction, and it is of the most vital importance to a large section of the State of Missouri, which in part I have the honor to represent, that more liberal appropriations be made for the improvement and deepening of the channel of the Missouri River and its tributaries, making them suitable for navigation. By so doing, we will not only make these rivers a part of the highways of that State by which the commerce of the country can be transported at a much less freight rate than is now being paid, but we will at the same time preserve and save as a part of the potential wealth of this country thousands of acres of fine agricultural lands now in a state of high cultivation in the Missouri River bottoms. The work of straightening and deepening the channel and revetting the banks of this river, with its treacherous quicksands, must of necessity be of such a character, when completed, as will protect and preserve the highly improved farms and fertile fields along this river, many of which are now being swept away by thousands of acres annually. It is impossible to estimate the value of lands thus being lost.

The finest farms we have in Missouri, with broad acres of rich, fertile soil, producing an untold wealth of agricultural products, are carried away in this stream every year. Farms upon which corn, wheat, oats, alfalfa—in fact, all agricultural products that are produced over the country—are produced in great quantities on these farms, and the annual value of these crops is inestimable. Fine homes, farm houses, and even good towns are constantly threatened with danger and frequently claimed as the victims of this treacherous water, and all of this because the Government fails to make adequate and suitable appropriations by which this river can be made a highway for commerce, which at the same time would preserve and protect all of this valuable property to its owners.

Congress has appropriated millions of dollars to assist and feed the starving people of foreign countries, for the relief of the railroads, to aid the arid and drought-stricken districts of the Dakotas and northwest section of our own country, yet we stop at the paltry sum of $27,000,000 for the improvement of all the great rivers and harbors of our country, when we have just appropriated more than $100,000,000 for the Shipping Board alone.

This is a false economy of the worst type, and I am here to tell you that the taxpaying public of the Central and Western States are waking up to a realization that the relief from their burdens of paying high and excessive freight rates, which absorbs all the profits of their industries, whether it be on the farm or in the factory, lies in securing the establishment of national highways and in opening up our rivers to commerce. The fight is on and, in my opinion, should never cease until Congress grants the relief to which they are entitled. Are we here to legislate for the people of this country, or do we intend to shut our eyes to their welfare and legislate for the benefit of the railroad companies?

Since coming to Congress my investigation of this subject has disclosed some most astounding facts and have caused me to determine to battle for the rights of the people in this matter so long as I have the breath of life in me. To illustrate what the adoption of this amendment means to the farming and business interests that I have the honor to represent, and which, of course, applies with equal force to all States similarly interested as my own, permit me to call your attention to one single instance that presents a forceful argument in itself. Only last month a shipment of 250,000 bushels of wheat was made from Omaha, Nebr., to St. Louis, Mo., by rail, and thence by boat on the river to New Orleans, and on this one shipment of wheat alone the farmers of Nebraska were saved 3 cents per bushel, or a total of $7,500, by availing themselves of the river transportation from St. Louis to New Orleans. Just think of it, if the Missouri River had been so improved that this shipment of wheat could have been made entirely by water instead of partly by rail and partly by water the saving to the farmers of Nebraska on this one shipment of wheat alone would have been $15,000 instead of $7,500. When I realize, as I do, what river transportation will mean to the agricultural and business interests of my district I become determined that my efforts shall never cease until they have been accorded fair treatment. As an illustration of the practicability of river transportation, if one were needed, let me cite you to a concrete example which alone furnishes all the proof that might be required. A towboat with its fleet of barges recently made the trip from St. Louis to New Orleans by river in six days, carrying enough merchandise to load 12 full freight trains each carrying 50 loaded freight cars with 50,000 pounds of merchandise to the car, and this freight was carried at 80 per cent of the rate of the railroad which parallels this great river, and the astounding fact of it all is that the rate of the railroad paralleling the river is only about 50 per cent of the average railroad rate of the country; and notwithstanding this unfair competition this barge line is being successfully operated at a profit to its owners.

These cutthroat rail rates are of course made where the railroads have river competition in order to drive such competition off the river, and I am wondering how long the Congress of the United States will permit such unfair and unjust railroad rate discriminations to be made. The people who do not have the benefit of river transportation should be brought to realize that the railroad companies are making them pay a high rail rate to make up for the low rates which the railroad companies establish where they have river competition. How long are we going to sit idly by and permit these unfair and unjust discriminations to exist? When is a better time than now to begin to open up all of our rivers to commerce?

I have briefly mentioned the possibilities and savings that can be effected for our people by improving the Missouri River, and I could speak with like force concerning all of its navigable tributaries, particularly that of the Osage. Back during the days when the little giant, the Hon. Joseph W. McClurg, who was governor of my imperial State and who has long since gone to a just reward, the Osage River was the only means of transporting the commerce of a large section of that State. I am credibly informed by the pioneers of that country, in which I have the honor to reside, that tons upon tons of freight were carried annually by steamboat up the Osage River to Linn Creek and thence hauled overland to Springfield and all of southwest Missouri and into the State of Arkansas by ox teams, these primeval teams at times making a train a mile in length. I have only recently had a letter from the president of one of the prominent manufacturing industries of my State informing me that notwithstanding the lack of proper Government improvements on the Osage he is now using it extensively for transporting much heavy freight, and states that its advantages if properly improved and enlarged upon would prove to be of untold value as a means of transportation and equal in importance to that of the Missouri. If this Hudson of the West could carry all of the commerce of that country in the days of the coonskin cap and the flintlock rifle, surely with a little help from a rich and powerful Government like our own it can to-day be made one of the great highways of our country, and should be brought back into use.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the fight is on and that the people are entitled to relief and to all the natural advantages which rightly belong to them by having these God-given streams improved to the full extent of their capacity to render the service for which God intended them. The appropriation which we are asking is small indeed considered in the light of the manifest and manifold benefits to be derived from making it. It is only a beginning, and I expect to see under way and soon adopted by Congress a permanent program by which these rivers will be improved annually until the summit of our ambitions with regard to them have been reached.

We have just concluded a great peace conference, the Senate has ratified the treaties, and if all this means anything it means that we should spend less money to build up great armies and navies, and spend more money in building national highways and making our rivers and harbors suitable for navigation, and thus solve the transportation problems that are becoming more intensive every day. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allowed for discussion it is impossible to make a speech, and I must be content to declare my hearty support of the pending amendment. It is business economy, in this time of unemployment, to make liberal appropriations for all authorized public works. Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, has warmly indorsed such a policy, and the President in a speech to the Farm Conference, recently held in Washington, emphasized and strongly urged that a generous policy be adopted by Congress in reference to the matter of our waterways and harbors at this time. The Army engineers have shown the great need of additional funds over the amount carried in the bill as reported, and I can but feel that the House will by a large vote support the amendment.

My colleague [Mr. MCDUFFIE], who is unavoidably absent to-day, has mailed me a very forceful and convincing statement on the merits of the pending amendment, and I wish to have it read to the House and include it as a part of my remarks. The statement of Congressman MCDUFFIE is as follows:

As to the item for $27,637,000 carried in the bill for river and harbor improvement, the engineers claim this will maintain every important project, but owing to the deteriorated condition of the plant and equipment, which needs repair and the need of additional dredges, together with the three or four millions of dollars which must be set aside for emergency, the $27,000,000 item is entirely inadequate, and under this item very little work can be done on the projects already adopted. The expenditures by the engineers since last December 1 average $2,500,000 a month. All the funds available have been allocated with the exception of $203,500, therefore it will be readily seen that for the coming fiscal year the item carried in this bill is not enough for the proper functioning of the Department of Engineers, and under this niggardly policy of providing for river and harbor improvement for the past two years, according to the testimony of General Taylor, several of the major projects have not been properly maintained. A continuation of this policy would destroy this very important governmental activity.

The rail-borne commerce of the Nation for the year 1920 was 329,000,000 tons of an approximate value of $19,000,000. The commerce of inland waterways and canals for 1920 was 162,000,000 tons of the approximate value of $2,000,000,000. These figures would indicate the necessity for carrying out the policy of Congress outlined in section 500 of the transportation act, which provides for the encouraging, promotion, and developing of water transportation. The country needs the services of both water and rail transportation. In normal times the railroads can not properly handle the traffic. It has been the policy of the railroads, and naturally so, to kill water transportation, and until we can so fix the law as to prevent the choking to death of water transportation by the railroads we can not hope to derive the full benefits of our inland waterways.

(The above is set out in the testimony of General Taylor and Colonel Ashburn contained in part 2 of the hearings on the War Department appropriation bill for 1923.)

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, the Members of the great Mississippi Valley States are called upon year after year to vote appropriations for Atlantic and Pacific coast waterway development and for developments upon the Great Lakes and upon the Gulf of Mexico.

The States of this valley have been united for years in an effort to make of the Mississippi River a channel of commerce.

This river is nearly 1,000 miles in length, passes through some of the richest, most fertile, and prosperous territory in America.

The undertaking is too great for any individual States, and the only recourse is an appeal to Congress.

Money is wasted because Congress has failed to pursue a systematic, continuous program.

We come again to-day, knowing the financial situation of the country is not at its best, but feeling that this improvement is of benefit to all the people and that it can not be permitted to lapse at this time.

Recently there appeared before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee three members of the President's Cabinet, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce.

These three Secretaries united in the advocacy of the purchase of a canal in New England, only 8 miles in length and at a cost of $11,500,000. I was impressed with their arguments and feel disposed to vote for this canal, because it is part of a general scheme of waterways improvement for the benefit of the whole country.

I believe that my personal attitude on this subject is characteristic of most of the Representatives in the House and Senate from this valley district, and it should be given consideration by the Members from the coast States.

Our demands met the approval of the governors of the great States through which the Mississippi River flows, of the legislatures of those States and the mayors of the prosperous cities, and is but carrying out the recommendation of our Army engineers who were selected by the American Government to advise Congress in such matters.

The matter of freight rates has been well and ably discussed by other Members.

The effect of river transportation upon the whole general system has been explained.

Recently, however, the national impetus given to the building of State highways, supplemented by State efforts, promises the development of a great national highway system of fine roads carrying trucks with heavy loads. These highways will be immediate and quick feeders to river transportation, so that citizens not only upon the borders of the river, but from 100 to 150 miles distant, will be served by this cheap form of transportation.

We only ask that in this appropriation we be given the same consideration which is extended to improvements upon the oceans, the Lakes and the Gulf, and we will never be satisfied until this is done.

Great drainage programs, the building of railroads in Alaska, and the developments of various portions of our country, are supported by the Representatives from those sections.

Valley States now unitedly ask consideration, and we shall insist upon it and keep on insisting until the great river is made fit for water transportation which will reduce the cost of moving freight from over 24 States in the Union. We are united and determined that this shall be done.

What the people of other countries in the world can do the American people can do. What foreign engineers can accomplish American engineers can accomplish. And the ultimate accomplishment is worthy of the best efforts of the American Congress.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand it the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has 28 minutes remaining. I have 26 and the gentleman from Mississippi 9. Since the gentleman from Wisconsin has more time, the gentleman from Mississippi and I having yielded to seven or eight since he has yielded any time, I assume he is holding back for the purpose of not putting anyone on until after we have exhausted time, and I submit that is unfair.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is unfair for the gentleman from New York to make that statement in view of the private statement I made to him that I would use at least 15 minutes in closing. I am not seeking in anywise to take unfair advantage, and that is the first time anyone has made that charge to me.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I withdraw it, and I ask the gentleman to use a little time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very auspicious occasion. It is one of the best symptoms I have seen in the House recently that we are getting back to normalcy. Here is an effort to raise an appropriation beyond that recommended by the committee having the measure in charge for river and harbor work. Some of us here remember the days of the good old "pork-barrel" efforts in the line of appropriations, and we have not heard much about it since the beginning of the war period. I think to-day ought to be a very happy one with us, in that we have such an open confession that it is time once more to open the floodgates of the Treasury and pour forth the millions necessary to reestablish our old friend the "pork barrel." It seems to me like old times. And quite a few of us are delighted that that condition has returned, in spite of the fact that we are opposed to this appropriation. I like the symptom, but I do not like the medicine you are trying to give us. I suppose it will be voted. The fact that the Republican Party and, I think, also the Democratic Party stand by their platforms for economy, preach it from the platform and preach it on the stump, has no effect on the voting attitude of the men making those preachments out among the hustings. We are going out pretty soon, my friends, Republicans and Democrats alike, and we are going to preach economy, the wonderful economy of this Congress and of this administration, and I for one want to vote the way I am going to preach. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman take that much time in order to answer a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yielded back the balance of my time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have never voted for a river and harbor bill in my life. I am going to change my mind this time and support the Dempsey amendment. [Applause.] I have been forced to that conclusion by the logic of events. I have been forced to it by my study of the railroad situation of the country and of the needs of the great Middle West, the country of which I am a part. I will not have time to discuss that matter now, but I could not help thinking about something as I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] make his speech, who is in opposition to this bill.

This bill, I think, would increase the Budget appropriations by about $15,000,000, and this $15,000,000 we people out in the country in which I live really think would be of some assistance in gradually reducing the railroad rates in this country. I could not help but think of a bill pending in one of the House committees to appropriate $12,000,000 to buy a ditch up through the State of Massachusetts, called the Cape Cod Canal, which I guarantee the gentleman is for. [Applause.] If he is not for it, I yield time for him to say that he is not for it. The gentleman wants to appropriate $12,000,000 for the purpose of buying a ditch, that did not cost that much, to cross the Cape Cod isthmus, for the purpose of affecting the New England freight rates——

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And the Secretary of War recommended $10,500,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, yes. We have followed here a policy which has destroyed the river transportation of this country. If this appropriation is only $27,000,000 it will only furnish sufficient funds to dredge and take care of the large harbors of the country, and it will be used there first.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have not time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is making an erroneous statement.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know what I am talking about. I have talked with General Beach and General Taylor quite recently, and I know what they tell me, and I will take their word. It will furnish only enough money to keep the seacoast harbors open. It will not furnish enough to keep the river improvements up, projects which we have started years ago, under the leadership of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and others. If sufficient appropriations are made here much of the work which we have already done will be lost. River channels will fill with silt and snags and dams and permanent works will wash away and rot down. So that if the people of our country finally come to the place where they want two transportation systems in this country, river and rail, those opposed to such a plan will answer by saying, "We have no rivers to use." [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DEMPSEY. And I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, this amendment should prevail. Its effect would be to increase the amount set forth in this bill to the sum recommended by the Chief of Engineers. It would exceed, of course, the estimate that has been suggested by the Director of the Budget. As between General Dawes and the Corps of Engineers, I stand with the engineers, who know more about it than he does.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUPRÉ. I can not yield.

What have we been doing here in later years in regard to river and harbor appropriations? Year before last it was $12,000,000. Last year it was $15,000,000—an utterly inadequate and niggardly sum, considering the works those appropriations were to conserve and complete. Now it is proposed to bring this amount up to the sum which the men who know more about it than anyone else suggest, namely, $42,000,000; and everyone knows that the estimate submitted by the Chief of Engineers was cut down to the bone before it was turned in. It should have been very much more than was estimated for.

What has been the effect of this piecemeal and hand-to-mouth appropriation? Intolerable delay and resultant waste. Take a proposition of which I am aware, the Southwest Pass at the mouth of the river. The Mississippi River has five mouths. I know some gentlemen in this House who would and do envy the river having those five mouths. The only one that is usable now is the South Pass, which was made possible through the genius of James B. Eads. For 20 years we have been fooling with the Southwest Pass. In 1902 that project was first adopted by Congress, and never since in those 20 years has Congress given sufficient money to the engineers to carry out any plan in a systematic, businesslike way.

The engineers in charge now think that they see the light of day; that if they are given $3,000,000 they can finish this thing within the next year. We ought to finish it. Give us enough money to finish it, or if they can not do so let us get some other additional new route to the sea. One year we have a bunch of economists in this body paring things down to $12,000,000, and another bunch the next year cutting the appropriation limit to $15,000,000. Now is the opportunity for us, the people's Representatives, to vote to give the amount that those who are responsible say will be sufficient for this improvement. And so the amendment of the gentleman from New York ought to prevail, and I think it will prevail. How can the people of the Mississippi Valley have their products go down that river if at any time we are liable to have its only outlet blocked up by some catastrophe that no engineer can foresee. Let the work be completed this coming year in Southwest Pass or confess its failure and resort to some other protection against being bottled up—the tragedy in South Pass.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for this amendment. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I come from a State where there are dry rivers and no harbors, and yet I am going to vote for this amendment. [Applause.]

I am in favor of increasing this appropriation for river and harbor improvements from $27,000,000 to $42,000,000, because I believe that now is the time to undertake public works in the United States. Now is the time when Congress should do everything possible to get the great flywheel of industry off a dead center and start it revolving. Let Congress do something in a legitimate way to provide a market for labor and materials, and an appropriation of this kind will certainly have that effect.

The Chief of Engineers of the Army, after careful investigation, has recommended the larger appropriation carried in the pending amendment. I am convinced that the sum thus determined is not only needed, but that it will be wisely expended by the War Department.

It is urged by Members that river and harbor improvements are of exclusive advantage to particular localities and not of national interest. Let me quote from a very high and respected authority on that question. On June 20, 1848, Abraham Lincoln, then a Representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, addressed the House on the subject of internal improvements. In this speech Mr. Lincoln answered the current arguments against congressional appropriations for such purposes and said:

> Do nothing at all, lest you do something wrong, is the sum of these positions. * * * No commercial object of Government patronage can be so exclusively general as not to be of some peculiar local advantage; * * * but the converse is also true. Nothing is so local as not to be of some general benefit.

Lincoln was right, and this Congress will do what is best for the country if, in addition to this appropriation, and for the same reasons we should report out a public buildings bill and pass it at this session. Since the year 1913 no general appropriation has been made to carry on the necessary work of constructing public buildings in the United States.

The Treasury Department has reported that during the present fiscal year over $4,570,000 will be paid for the rental of space for that use of the various departments in cities where Federal buildings are now located. That sum represents interest at 5 per cent on over $90,000,000, which should demonstrate that Congress can well afford to appropriate money for the construction of additional public buildings in numerous instances. There are many other cities and towns where it can likewise be shown that it would be of material advantage to the Government to cease paying rent and construct its own Federal buildings. In my opinion, at least $50,000,000 could be wisely and profitably expended for this purpose.

Last October the President called a conference on unemployment which, after a week of discussion and consideration, submitted a report that, I regret to say, Congress has up to this time totally ignored. Among the most important recommendations made by the conference was that $16,200,000 be appropriated to speed up the work on the United States reclamation projects now under construction. It was estimated that by this means employment would be afforded to about 32,000 workers either directly on the projects or indirectly through furnishing materials, machinery, and supplies.

The Reclamation Service further reported to the conference that the following projects had been thoroughly investigated and could be undertaken immediately which would furnish employment to between 25,000 and 30,000 men on the work itself and indirectly to about 15,000 more:

State.	Project.	Immediate expenditure.	Additional to complete.
Arizona-Nevada	Boulder Canyon Dam	$5,000,000	$50,000,000
California	All-American Canal and laterals	15,000,000	20,000,000
Arizona	Parker	4,000,000	10,000,000
	San Carlos	4,000,000	10,000,000
		28,000,000	90,000,000

It is a great pity that the advice thus earnestly given was not followed. Nothing that could have been done would have had a more stimulating effect on business conditions, because it has been repeatedly demonstrated that the reclamation of waste lands not only makes homes for our citizens but creates a permanent market for manufactured goods of every character.

Congress is the last place where any doubt should be expressed as to the future of the United States of America. If we believe in our country, let us show our faith by our works. During periods of prosperity the Government may wisely postpone the construction of desirable projects and thus avoid paying high prices for materials and extraordinary wages for labor. But in times like the present, when millions of men are idle, when factories are closed and business is depressed, Congress should set a courageous example by voting money for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the construction of public buildings, the reclamation of waste lands, and every other kind of public works.

Two hundred and fifty billion dollars is a conservative estimate of our national wealth. Why should we hesitate to expend less than 1 per cent of that amount on internal improvements based upon the best of engineering advice and all of which is not wasted, as in the costs of warfare, but permanently invested in productive construction which as time goes on will confer benefits to the American people far in excess of the sums appropriated. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED].

Mr. DEMPSEY. And I yield him one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman, the problem of developing the water shipping facilities of the Great Lakes region and the country tributary to the ports of these lakes, including great areas of the Middle Western and Northwestern States, has been for many years brought to the attention of the Board of Engineers of the War Department of the United States and other governmental officials having the responsibility of recommending the development of national waterways and better and cheaper shipping facilities of this great granary and other areas of our country. During the past two years, especially formidable propaganda of a several years' campaign of propaganda has culminated in remarkable political and other pressure on high officials and on the Congress of the United States in this direction. The recent National Farmers' Congress, at its meeting here in Washington, unqualifiedly indorsed this scheme as one of many panaceas for the many very real troubles of the farmers of this country incident to their present financial straits. It was not surprising, therefore, that President Harding announced to the farmers at their recent convention that he favored this measure as one that would give them a direct all-water route from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, via Montreal, Canada, and the St. Lawrence River and Gulf of St. Lawrence, which would relieve them of the high freight rates on their grain to be shipped direct from the ports of the Great Lakes. Besides the large political considerations to hold the "farm bloc" in line for the Republican Party at the coming fall and ensuing elections, the President's action in this direction was based on the report of the Joint International Commission, which had been authorized to study and report to the President and Congress on the feasibility of joint action between the United States and Canada in developing the so-called St. Lawrence route for navigation and power purposes. It may be stated in this connection that eminent engineers agree on the vast water-power sources of the St. Lawrence River, and had suggested that private capital could be secured to develop it, and incidentally develop navigation without any cost whatever to the United States and Canada. The proponents of the St. Lawrence plan claim that the cost per horsepower of developing this water power will be low, while equally eminent authorities, on the contrary, insist that the cost per horsepower will be unreasonably high.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION'S REPORT.

The International Joint Commission was created by the terms of the treaty of Washington, dated January 11, 1909, and the original authorization for the survey of the St. Lawrence River from Montreal to Lake Ontario for the International Joint Commission, in cooperation with engineers of the Canadian Government, was given by the United States river and harbor act, approved March 2, 1919.

These engineers, representatives of the two Governments, formulated a draft of a letter for referring the matter to the International Joint Commission in a draft of a memorandum of instructions to engineers to be appointed by the two Governments to obtain the data needed for facilitating the preparation of the commission's report on the subject.

The joint memorandum was approved by the United States, and the Secretary of State referred it to the International Joint Commission on January 21, 1920, in a letter as follows:

JANUARY 21, 1920.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to inform you that the Governments of the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada, under the provisions of article 9 of the treaty of the 11th of January, 1909, between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, herewith refer certain questions, as set forth below, involving the beneficial use of the waters of the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, in the interests of both countries, and, in general, the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other along their common frontier.

It is desired that the said questions be made the basis of an investigation to be carried out by the International Joint Commission, to the end that the said commission may submit a report to the two countries covering the subject matter of this reference, together with such conclusions and recommendations as may be considered pertinent in the premises.

Question 1. What further improvement in the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Lake Ontario, is necessary to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the Lake or ocean-going type; what draft of water is recommended; and what is the estimated cost?

In answering this question the commission is requested to consider—

(a) Navigation interests alone, whether by the construction of locks and dams in the river; by side canals with the necessary locks; or by a combination of the two.

(b) The combination of navigation and power interests to obtain the greatest beneficial use of the waters of the river.

Question 2. Which of the schemes submitted by the Government or other engineers is preferred, and why?

Question 3. Under what general method of procedure and in what general order shall the various physical and administrative features of the improvement be carried out?

Question 4. Upon what basis shall the capital cost of the completed improvement be apportioned to each country?

Question 5. Upon what basis shall the costs of operation and maintenance be apportioned to each country?

Question 6. What method of control is recommended for the operation of the improved waterway to secure the most beneficial use?

Question 7. Will regulating Lake Ontario increase the low-water flow in the St. Lawrence Ship Channel below Montreal; and if so, to what extent and at what additional cost?

Question 8. To what extent will the improvement develop the resources, commerce, and industry of each country?

Question 9. What traffic, both incoming and outgoing, in kind and quantity, is likely to be carried upon the proposed route both at its inception and in the future? Consideration to be given not only to present conditions but to probable changes therein resulting from the development of industrial activities due to availability of large quantities of hydraulic power.

Pending the receipt of plans, estimates, and other engineering data necessary for the final consideration of this reference, the commission is requested to hold such public hearings as may be considered necessary or advisable in order to obtain all information bearing directly or indirectly on the physical, commercial, and economic feasibility of the project as a whole.

To facilitate the preparation of the desired report each Government will, from its official engineering personnel, appoint an engineer with full authority to confer with a similar officer of the other Government for the purposes: (1) Of acquiring each in his own country such data as may be found necessary to supplement the existing engineering data and surveys, and (2) of preparing complete outline plans for and estimates of the cost of the proposed improvement, including the value of all property easements, damages, and rights connected therewith. These plans and estimates are to be submitted to the commission as soon as practicable, but not later than one year from the date of appointment, and the commission is requested to forward to the two Governments its final report with recommendations not later than three months thereafter. A copy of the instructions furnished these engineers is attached hereto.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

In the treaties now in force between the United States of America and Great Britain, namely, the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842, the reciprocity treaty of 1854, the treaty of Washington, 1871, and the treaty of Washington of 1909, it is provided that the St. Lawrence River shall forever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States. This last-named and important phase of the matter will be discussed later, in connection with the real significance, or lack of significance that might be attached to this guaranty, on the part of Great Britain, in time of war, that—the St. Lawrence River shall forever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States.

The report of the Board of Engineers recommended the improvement of this waterway for navigation and power purposes, and the United States International Joint Commission, January 10, 1922, recommended to the Governments of the United States and the Dominion of Canada the completion of the new Welland Canal, connecting Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, and the improvement of the St. Lawrence River from Lake Ontario to the Atlantic Ocean for navigation and power purposes.

The report of the International Joint Commission submitted to the Congress of the United States by President Harding and made Senate Document No. 114, January 16, 1922, was favorable to the so-called St. Lawrence River route from the Great Lakes to the sea via Montreal, Canada.

It probably can be truly said that no report on any waterway has ever created in this country more interest and, in certain sections, excitement and opposition among the people of certain sections of this country and their congressional representatives, and in the Provinces of Canada most affected by this gigantic scheme for the development of water power and navigation. This route proposes to utilize as a connecting link between the United States and Canadian ports of the Great Lakes, the existing Welland Ship Canal, connecting Lake Erie and Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River and the Gulf of St. Lawrence via Montreal and Quebec to the Atlantic Ocean.

Alternative routes to be mentioned later have been proposed by the United States Government Board of Engineers and by the International Joint Commission.

President Harding announced to a Committee of the Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, of which committee I am a member, and subsequently to the National Farmers' Congress that recently met in Washington, that he strongly favored the St. Lawrence route and would recommend it in a message to the Congress of the United States, and which he has submitted to Congress.

Quickly following the favorable report of the International Joint Commission, Hon. WILLIAM W. CHALMERS, Member of Congress from the Toledo, Ohio, district, introduced a bill in the House of Representatives, entitled:

For the establishment of an international board to have jurisdiction of the construction, operation, and control of the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway—and which provides in part, as follows:

That an international board be established, composed of six members, three on the part of the United States, one appointed by the President thereof, one by the President of the Senate, and one by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and three on the part of Great Britain.

The board shall have jurisdiction of the construction, operation, and control of the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario and from Lake Ontario to the sea, providing for a channel 30 feet deep, and shall determine the final plans for the construction of the improvement for navigation and power purposes.

That one-half of the cost of the construction, maintenance, and operation of the navigation and power works shall be borne by the United States of America and one-half by the Dominion of Canada.

One-half of the hydroelectric power generated by the construction of this work shall be credited to the United States of America and one-half to the Dominion of Canada, and the international board shall supervise the control, use, and sale of the power thus made available.

The expenditure of the sum of $1,000,000 authorized under this proposed law to be paid from funds of the United States, under the control of the American section of the international board, and to be transferred to the control of the international board when completed by the legal appointment of the Canadian section of said international board and the appropriation of an equal amount of money by the Dominion of Canada. This joint appropriation is to be used by the international board for organization purposes and to start the work until additional funds are made available.

The international board is, by the Chalmers bill, authorized to issue bonds, guaranteed by the United States of America and Great Britain, in an amount necessary to pay for the construction of the navigation and power works of the proposed international waterway.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives referred the Chalmers bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce instead of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which all bills providing for waterways are usually referred. This raised a storm of protest from each of the four committees of the House which sought to have this bill referred to it—the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Ways and Means, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The matter of reference of Congressman CHALMERS's bill was finally fought out on the floor of the House on an appeal from Speaker GILLETT's reference of it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the House deciding by a decisive vote to sustain the Speaker and to refer the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, except the matter of the bond issue provided for in the bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means on motion of Congressman NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, of Ohio.

Inasmuch as the report of the International Joint Commission recommends that, before the final adoption of the St. Lawrence River route, the St. Lawrence project be further investigated and again reported on by a board of eminent consulting engineers, and inasmuch also as a treaty, or some similar arrangement, with Canada has to be negotiated by this country before the Congress of the United States can give final authorization and the immense appropriation required by this scheme, it will, in all reasonable probability, require at least a year or more before Congress can finally vote upon this measure and authorize the St. Lawrence route, or any other route, for ocean-going ships from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic.

The other alternative route or routes proposed is one of the several all-American routes through the State of New York, the chief of which would, as far as practicable, utilize the famous New York State Barge Canal system, on which the State of New York has already expended about $200,000,000 and which is now being made more useful than ever, at an additional large outlay, by the completion and utilization of the numerous terminals and grain elevators of the barge canal system in the great city of New York.

The increasing importance of the New York State Barge Canal system will be appreciated by a glimpse of the extent and growing usefulness of this system, not only for the benefit of New York State but for the benefit also of the Northwest and Middle West.

The canals herein described are owned by the State of New York and are under the jurisdiction of the superintendent of public works for management, maintenance, repair, and operation.

Under the provisions of the State constitution navigation of the canals is free, no charge being made for passage through the locks. The constitution also provides that the canals shall not be sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of, but must remain the property of the State and under its management forever. Appropriations to meet the cost of maintenance and operation are yearly made from the State treasury.

The canal system of New York State consists of the Erie Canal, the Champlain Canal, the Oswego Canal, the Cayuga and Seneca Canal, the Cayuga Lake Inlet at Ithaca, the Black River Canal, the Glen Falls feeder, and the lakes, reservoirs, feeders, harbor basins, and terminal docks connected therewith. The Shinnecock and Peconic Canal, located in the county of Suffolk, on Long Island, and connecting the waters of Shinnecock and Peconic Bays, is officially a part of the canal system.

The Erie Canal provides a splendid avenue for commerce between Lake Erie at Buffalo and the Hudson River at Troy, connecting also with Lake Ontario at Oswego through the Oswego Canal. The Cayuga and Seneca Canal, extending southerly from the Erie Canal to the Cayuga and Seneca Lakes, brings the water route in touch with the southern-tier counties.

In the eastern part of the State the Champlain Canal stretches to the north to Lake Champlain at Whitehall and affords a passage for vessels, in connection with Canadian waterways, to the St. Lawrence River.

In the canal-improvement plan natural waterways have been utilized wherever possible, and as a result navigation passes through a series of canalized lakes and rivers, which constitute about 70 per cent of the system.

The Erie Canal—commonly known as the "barge" canal—is the main waterway and extends across the State from Troy to Buffalo. The Mohawk River at the canal-channel entrance is at an elevation of 169.5 feet above the surface of the Hudson River at Waterford and is 184 feet higher than sea level at Albany. From this point navigation is carried through the canalized Mohawk River, with short land cuts at intervals, to Frankfort; thence through an artificial channel paralleling the Mohawk River to Rome, and crossing the divide enters the Oswego watershed 10 miles west of Rome, and following Wood Creek for 5 miles reaches the eastern end of Oneida Lake.

This lake is the largest natural body of water in the canal system, the channel stretching across it at a distance of 21 miles to Brewerton at its western end. From Brewerton the Oneida River is followed to its junction with the Seneca River at Three River Point; thence through the Seneca River to the Clyde River, and to and through the Clyde River to the foot of Lock No. 27 at Lyons. Here the bed of the Ganargua Creek is utilized, with frequent land cuts, to Palmyra, from which place the channel lies in the former Erie Canal, widened and deepened to a point just west of Pittsford.

An artificial channel there exists to the Genesee River, which is crossed about 2 miles south of the Rochester terminal on a pool created by a movable dam, and traffic enters what is locally known as the 60-mile level, consisting of an enlargement of the former Erie Canal, to Lockport.

At Lockport, by means of two combined locks, navigation is raised 50 feet to the elevation of the Niagara River, and thence an artificial channel is utilized to Tonawanda Creek. The canalized creek is followed to its junction with the Niagara River at Tonawanda. Through the Niagara River traffic passes to Lake Erie at Buffalo, the vessel being raised to the level of the lake by the United States Government lock at Squaw Island.

The distance from Congress Street, Troy, to Lake Erie at Buffalo, is 355 miles, of which 215 miles lie in natural waterways, and 140 miles through artificial channels.

Albany, while not on the enlarged Erie Canal proper, is situated on the Hudson River, 6 miles below Troy.

At Utica a terminal basin exists to which entrance is had from the Erie Canal channel through a junction lock.

At Rochester harbor facilities have been provided on the pool created in the Genesee River.

At Buffalo harbors and terminals are available in the Erie Basin and the Ohio Basin, also the Lackawanna Slip as far as Miami Street may be used.

The Champlain Canal commences in the Hudson River at Waterford, where the improved Erie Canal turns westerly, and lies generally in the channel of the Hudson River canalized, with short land cuts, northerly to Lock No. 7 at Fort Edward. Here the canal departs from the Hudson River and follows a northerly course through an artificial channel a distance of 8 miles to Lock No. 9 at Smith's Basin, where the valley of Wood Creek is entered and, having been canalized, is utilized to the Lake Champlain Inlet at Whitehall. The length of the Champlain Canal from its junction with the Erie Canal to Whitehall is 61 miles, of which 34 miles lie in natural waterways and 27 miles through artificial channels.

In the city of New York canal terminals or docks with fully equipped warehouses and freight-handling machinery have been provided at several terminal docks situated in the Boroughs of Manhattan, Queens, and the Bronx.

A grain elevator providing every modern facility for the handling of grain transported by canal is now being erected at Gowanus Bay Terminal in the Borough of Brooklyn. Important terminal docks are also being completed in the Borough of Queens. It will be completed during the summer of 1922. A similar structure will also be built at the lake terminal at Oswego, and the foundations for the same already have been constructed.

It is desirable that every boat navigating the canals shall have a rounded bow and be equipped with a rudder. An anchor of suitable weight should be supplied, with sufficient length of rope. Bow and stern lines are essential.

The regulation forbidding the operation of rectangular-shaped barges on the canal was suspended in 1920. Close observation will be had of the use of such type of barge for the purpose of determining whether it may be generally utilized in the transportation of freight without danger to the canal structures.

It is possible for a boat 300 feet long and 42 feet wide, with a height of 15 feet above the water line and a draft of, say, 10 feet, to pass through the new canals. Such boat would have a carrying capacity of, say, 2,800 tons.

From observations made, it is likely that a barge of such maximum dimensions would be difficult to handle in portions of the canal channel where the width is restricted. Furthermore, special regulations would need to be observed by such boats in the sections of the canal where a 75-foot width of channel only has been provided. The commercial possibilities for general use of so large a boat are also to be doubted at the present time. It is not expected, therefore, that boats will be constructed of the maximum dimensions, nor is it believed that craft of such size would prove profitable to their owners for general use.

The freight boats in use during the season of 1921 are of varying dimensions, depending largely on the nature of the cargo carried and the ideas of the owner. The large number are of the type used on the waterways before the last enlargement and known as ordinary canal type. These are 98 feet by 17½ feet. They now operate with a draft of 7 feet and carry approximately 300 tons. Others range in length from 104 to 105 feet with widths running from 22 feet 3 inches to 22 feet 6 inches. The largest craft which made its appearance on the canal was a motor-ship type of steel construction 242.6 feet in length, 36.1 feet of beam with a depth inside of 14 feet. With a draft of 10 feet, 1,700 tons of freight could be carried.

The first attempt to improve the State's inland waterways was undertaken by private companies chartered in 1792. A portion of the series of locks built by the Inland Navigation Co. at Little Falls is still in place.

The first State canal construction work was begun on July 4, 1817, at Rome, and the Erie, or main branch, was completed in 1825.

The original Erie Canal had a bottom width of 28 feet, a width at water surface of 40 feet, with a 4-foot depth of water. This is commonly referred to as the "Clinton ditch." The first boats carried 75 tons.

The original Champlain Canal was begun in 1817 and finished in 1823; the original Oswego Canal was begun in 1825 and finished in 1828. These three canals were of the same dimensions as the first Erie.

The first enlargement work on the Erie Canal was commenced in 1836 and completed in 1862. The bottom width was increased to a maximum of 56 feet, and at water line to 70 feet, with a depth of 7 feet. In 1896 the work of deepening the Erie Canal to 9 feet was begun, but was completed only at disconnected localities.

In 1860 the widening of the Champlain Canal so as to give 35 feet and 50 feet widths, respectively, at the bottom and water line, and a depth of 5 feet was authorized. In 1870 the increase of these widths to 44 feet and 58 feet, respectively, with a depth of 7 feet, was directed, but the improvement was not completed. A further enlargement, begun in 1896, to provide a depth of 7 feet, was not progressed to completion.

The first enlargement of the Oswego Canal was commenced in 1852 and completed 10 years later. A channel of 52½ feet and 70 feet in width, respectively, at the bottom and surface, with a depth of 7 feet, was provided. In 1896 the improvement of this canal to a depth of 9 feet was begun, but not completed.

In 1916 the improved Champlain Canal for its entire length from Troy to Whitehall was placed in commission for the first time.

The canal route from Troy to Oswego via the improved Erie and Oswego Canals was first used in 1917.

The through route of the improved Erie Canal from Troy to Buffalo was opened in 1918.

The building of terminal docks and the furnishing of freight-handling facilities along the improved canals was authorized in 1911, and the work was begun in the following year.

The total number of locks on the main channels of the improved canals, exclusive of the United States Government lock at Troy, is 56. There are 34 locks on the Erie Canal; 11 on the Champlain Canal; 7 on the Oswego Canal; and 4 on the Cayuga and Seneca Canal. In addition, there are two junction locks and two guard locks.

A preliminary examination, by the rivers and harbors act, approved March 2, 1919, was authorized of such routes between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River as may be considered practical by the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and a study of the project was made by the Board on Deep Waterways, whose report was printed as House Document 149, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.

According to this report there are several feasible routes for a waterway connecting the Great Lakes with the Hudson River. A second route proceeds from the Oswego River, on Lake Ontario, by way of Oneida Lake and Mohawk River to Normans Kill. This route was preferred by the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways, but the construction of the Oswego branch of the Barge Canal over this route now renders the project more difficult of execution. This route, or any other route from Lake Ontario, implies the construction of a waterway between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario to afford connection with the upper lakes, unless it is found expedient to rely upon the Welland Canal for this connection. Another route proceeds from a point opposite Coteau Landing, on the St. Lawrence River, to Lake Champlain, and thence to Fort Edward, utilizing the canalized Hudson to Normans Kill. The route involves the improvement of the upper St. Lawrence, the navigable capacity of which is now restricted to vessels drawing 14 feet.

In reference to the desirability of the proposed canal, the district engineer states that this would depend chiefly upon how much of the present through lake commerce would use the new canal and what saving of freight charges, if any, would be effected. It should be borne in mind, however, that the need for economical transportation of the present bulk commerce of the Lakes is not the only need to be met. The great manufacturing cities of the Lakes now have a tremendous export and import traffic passing through Atlantic ports, chiefly New York. This traffic is now carried by rail and is subject to heavy charges for freight and terminal and transfer costs. As a result of his study of the subject the district engineer reaches the conclusion that it is not advisable for the United States to undertake the construction of a waterway connecting the Great Lakes with the Hudson River at the present time. The division engineer concurs in the views of the district engineer.

This report has been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to its report, dated May 25, 1920. The board states that if an adequate waterway were made available with suitable terminal and transfer facilities at the principal Lake ports a large amount of general merchandise and most of the grain might be carried to the seaboard either in ocean-going vessels or in Lake vessels, transferring at New York City.

In its original condition the Great Lakes system could be navigated by very small vessels only, practically all entrances to harbors and all connecting waters being more or less shallow and obstructive to navigation. Active work of improvement by the United States began about 1824, since which time, at a cost of about $150,000,000 up to 1918, all the principal harbors and all connecting waters except the Niagara River have been made navigable for large lake vessels drawing 19 to 21 feet of water. Between Lakes Erie and Ontario navigation is now possible through the Welland Canal, which has a depth of 14 feet, but is being reconstructed so as to provide a present depth of 25 feet, with 30 feet through the locks.

The main line of the New York State Barge Canal system, having a depth of 12 feet, connects Lake Erie with the Hudson River. Branch lines connect with Lake Ontario and with Lake Champlain, which is also connected through its outlet, the Richelieu River, with the St. Lawrence 46 miles below Montreal. The project depth in the upper Hudson is 12 feet from Waterford to Hudson, a distance of 38 miles. A lock and dam affording a navigable depth of 14 feet has been constructed at Troy.

This project is understood to be primarily for a ship channel or waterway, the matter of combining these with the development of water power not to be considered except as it might be incidental to practicable routes for navigation by ocean-going vessels between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River. A waterway between Lake Erie and the Hudson River must be overland from the east end of Lake Erie, or by ship canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario, and thence to the Hudson via the Oswego and Mohawk Rivers, or via the St. Lawrence River and Lake Champlain. A land line across western New York is eliminated from consideration because of its excessive cost and the existence of the New York State Barge Canal. Lake Ontario must, therefore, form part of the route. There are three practicable locations for a connection between Lakes Erie and Ontario—the Welland Canal, in Canada; the Tonawanda-Olcott and the La Salle-Lewiston routes in the United States, the latter being preferable. The International Joint Commission is now investigating the question of a combined ship and power development project for the St. Lawrence River. Such a project would afford an outlet from Lake Ontario to the sea and might be used in connection with the Lake Champlain route to reach the Hudson River. The Oswego-Mohawk route has the advantage of being entirely within the United States.

The district engineer discusses the large increase in the size of vessels in recent years, and from his analysis concludes that a lakes to ocean waterway should be designed to accommodate vessels 700 feet long, 70 feet beam, and 22 feet draft, and ocean vessels 550 feet long, 78 feet beam, and 27½ feet draft. For such vessels the canal should be approximately 30 feet deep and 215 to 240 feet wide, with locks 740 feet long, 80 feet wide, and a depth of 30 feet on the sills.

If a ship channel were constructed along the route of the existing New York State Barge Canal, that canal would have to be abandoned, although parts of it might be utilized. Two routes are possible for a connection between the St. Lawrence River and Lake Champlain; the Richelieu River-Chambly Canal route and a land route from Lake St. Francis to Lake Champlain. The latter route would be the shorter and apparently less expensive.

The fall between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario is about 326 feet, and a canal connecting these lakes could be used to develop water power. Careful investigations, however, have demonstrated that a combined ship and power canal on the La Salle-Lewiston route would be more expensive and less satisfactory than separate developments for navigation and for power. In considering the question of a waterway suitable for ocean-going vessels, there must be taken into account the restricted portions of the waters connecting the Great Lakes, as well as the many harbors which have inadequate facilities for such vessels.

Considerable emphasis is to be laid on the sentence just quoted as to how much of the present through Lake commerce would use any ship canal, and what saving, if any, of freight charges would be effected. These important phases of the subject will be discussed more thoroughly later, in connection with the International Joint Commission report on the so-called St. Lawrence River route from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard, via Montreal, Canada.

This report further states that—if an adequate waterway were made available, with suitable terminal and transfer facilities at the principal Lake ports, a large amount of general merchandise and most of the grain might be carried to the seaboard either in ocean-going vessels, or in Lake vessels, transferring at New York City.

THE GREAT DEBATE ON THE ST. LAWRENCE ROUTE BETWEEN GOVERNOR MILLER AND GOVERNOR ALLEN.

The arguments for and against the St. Lawrence River route were ably presented in a notable debate between Governor Miller, of New York, and Governor Allen, of Kansas.

I quote from memory this debate between Gov. Nathan L. Miller, of New York, and Governor Allen, of Kansas, at Washington, March 1, 1922. Governor Miller admits Governor Allen's claim that the Middle West and the whole country had suffered with breaking down of transportation and high freight rates. Governor Miller suggested the natural remedy for the West was to open up a waterway to the Mississippi River, to New Orleans, and connect there with the ocean ships. He said the cost and usefulness of the St. Lawrence River route were problematical; that it would cost probably twice $250,000,000, and in addition about the same amount to secure sufficient channels, docks, and so forth, in the Great Lake ports, and still many more millions to secure railroad terminals connecting with docks, and so forth. There is now in the Great Lakes and ports an average channel of about 20 to 22 feet, which would have to be deepened to harmonize with the proposed 30-foot channel in the St. Lawrence, and there is the same lack of proper channel in the Welland Canal, on which all work has been suspended for several years past. It is unfair to tax New York State the 30 per cent of the whole amount of the cost of the project, which is an experiment that is of doubtful value. Governor Miller ridiculed Governor Allen's idea that ships of considerable size could use the Lake ports.

Governor Miller quoted the decision of the United States Supreme Court and New York court of appeals, declaring New York owned the riparian rights of the St. Lawrence River bordering on New York State, and said if the United States Congress took over the water power—some 400,000 horsepower—it would not be fair to New York State to have the supervision of this power and the selling of it controlled by the United States and Canada, and that it would not be fair to raise all the money necessary to construct this whole project—St. Lawrence—of several hundred millions of dollars by selling the power to New York State and New England and making them pay for the whole project. This is on an assumption that the St. Lawrence project is to be paid for by a two hundred and fifty million dollar bond issue to be underwritten by the United States and Canada. The St. Lawrence route would be frozen five months of the year and the railroads would have to be used during these five months. It would require 10 years or more to complete the St. Lawrence project and 10 years additional to get it on an operating basis as to water power, and that no interest had been calculated on the $250,000,000 to be invested, and this would be an additional cost. He insisted that New York State and City feared nothing from any fair competition, and that New York City as a neutral harbor, where all of the agencies existed to distribute and assort goods—gave example Venezuela shipments—was one of the four great harbors of the world—London, Liverpool, Bremen, and New York. He urged that all of the facts be brought out by a new and unbiased board of engineers as to the St. Lawrence River route—with a sufficient appropriation to do this, and if after a fair investigation it were found that the project were feasible, New York State would not oppose it.

Governor Miller also referred to the fact that the port authority of New York and New Jersey had the power and was at this time exerting this authority, and with ample financial backing, to so develop the port of New York and New Jersey with railroad and other through freight facilities as to materially reduce the cost of shipping through and to the port of New York via the New York Barge Canal, and other freight routes to this port.

As to the varying, and in some cases hostile, sentiment of the people of Canada and the United States affected by the proposed St. Lawrence River route, I refer to the report of the International Joint Commission, dated December 19, 1921, which very frankly states that there is decided and widespread opposition in Canada to the St. Lawrence River scheme, both because of a lack of confidence in its promised results and because of the increase in taxation that would result if it were consummated.

Very recent newspaper reports from Ottawa, the Dominion's capital, would indicate that the treaty or any other similar agreements necessary to be negotiated between the United States and Canada before any such international waterway and power project could be undertaken or even commenced, would be seriously opposed by several of the Provinces of Canada, and that even the Province of Quebec, on account of the peculiar sentiment of the French people—who predominate in that Province—regarding their exclusive right to control the historic St. Lawrence River, would strenuously oppose any arrangement by which the Governments of the United States and Canada would jointly establish and use this route. This opposition in Canada is to be expected because of the facts just mentioned and also because of the still more potent fact that Canada is at the present time struggling under the burden of a war debt and is experiencing difficulty in raising the necessary money for current governmental expenses, in addition to which the approximately three hundred millions—according to the estimates of the engineers as reported by the International Joint Commission—to be raised for this project, which would mean a heavy increase in taxation in Canada and the United States. It must be borne in mind that Canada's population is a little over ten millions, and that her one-half or approximately one-half of the cost of this project would mean an even more serious burden to Canada than to the United States, where increased tax burdens of this amount and of much larger amounts—even up into the billions of dollars—do not seem to be too seriously considered by a majority of the people's representatives in the United States Congress.

Another argument in favor of the facilities for all-water, ocean shipments is the admitted fact that terminal and transshipment charges absorbed much of the profit on export shipments and prevented the losses, particularly on grain, due to transshipment at intermediate points from Lake boats to rail or canal boats and ocean vessels at Atlantic terminals.

The International Joint Commission, while as between rail and water rates, frankly stated that their comparisons and conclusions were conjectural, in the absence of any definite information as to what actual rates would apply to a shipment by ocean-going vessels from ports on the Great Lakes to European ports, and, in the absence of such information, the commission's report provides, as previously stated, for an additional survey and study of the St. Lawrence route by eminent engineers, and also necessarily provides for a joint commission to be appointed, respectively, by the United States and Canada to negotiate a treaty as a preliminary to any legislation on this subject by the Congress of the United States.

In this connection, emphasizing the importance to the congressional representatives of the people of this country of slow and deliberate action on this gigantic navigation and water-power scheme, I quote in part a letter from James G. White, president of the Merchants' Association of the State of New York, as follows:

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES.

The Merchants' Association has filed with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives a request for delay in action upon the St. Lawrence River canal project until the report of the International Joint Commission, which recommended it, can be studied and analyzed, it was announced yesterday.

The communication, which was signed by James G. White, acting president of the association, and has been sent to President Harding and every member of the committee, pointed out that the resolution now before Congress provides for an immediate appropriation of $1,000,000 and authorizes the international board to issue bonds, guaranteed by the United States and Great Britain, in an amount necessary to pay for construction of the canal and the proposed power plants. It is urged that the United States should not be committed to the project without thorough investigation.

No reasonable-minded person will seriously contend that in the present financial stress of this Nation a huge wasteful outlay would be justified, nor that under any circumstances would such be justifiable should it appear that Canada and not the United States would be the chief beneficiary, and that such result would be reached by inflicting severe injury upon the Atlantic and Gulf ports of the United States without adequate and compensating benefit to the interior portions of the country.

This undertaking involves an immense national outlay. It can be justified only if it can be incontrovertibly demonstrated that it will result in a national benefit. Its advocates contend that it will greatly benefit American agricultural interests by lessening the cost of grain transportation. This is open to grave question.

The export of grain from the United States is steadily diminishing. Year by year the grain production of the country is to a greater degree required for home consumption. In the opinion of many well-qualified judges, the export of grain from the United States will within a few years have practically ceased, and, so far as the export of grain produced in the United States is concerned, the St. Lawrence waterway will have ceased to have value.

The contrary is true of Canadian grain. Canada will without question be a chief future source of the world's grain supply, and that country will therefore be the chief beneficiary of the great outlay incurred by the United States in the St. Lawrence movement.

Well founded doubt exists as to the expediency of a great national investment intended to promote direct trade between Lake ports and foreign countries, the communication said. It may fairly be doubted whether such trade movement would be carried on in sufficient volume to warrant the proposed outlay. In any event, the growth of such direct trade would be very slow and its volume relatively small and its economic difficulties great.

The communication said that the demand of the western agricultural interests for cheap transportation had been filled in the construction of the barge canal at a cost of $200,000,000 to New York State.

The request for delay by Congress was based upon the report of the association's committee on inland waterways, the members of which are Herman A. Metz, Edward B. Brooks, John D. Dunlop, Capt. Alfred Brooks Fry, Augustus V. Hamburg, Prof. Olin H. Landreth, and R. A. C. Smith.

It is true, and naturally so, that strong opposition exists in the State of New York and other States, indicating that this opposition is not confined to one locality or group of States. Strong opposition has developed in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and other New England States, as well as in the Middle Atlantic and Southern States, and also, surprisingly, in Montreal and Quebec, Canada, the largest cities and ports situated on the St. Lawrence River.

An additional reason why Canada, as a whole, does not favor this proposition is because there is no real congestion of freight at any point in that country, either at the terminals—as there is at so many points in the United States—or on the railroads, and because the Canadian railway facilities are still well ahead of population and production—and probably will be for many years to come—these adequate railway trunk lines extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Railway inefficiency, on the other hand, in the United States may be chronic and it would require from one to two billions of dollars annually for many years to handle the traffic, in addition to the billions already invested in railways and railway terminals in the United States, and it is argued by the friends of the St. Lawrence route that even such expenditures would not afford the relief that is promised by the creation of an all-water route from the interior of the continent to the Atlantic seaboard, and it is admitted that this argument is sound provided that the St. Lawrence plan would bring about the relief through ocean freight rates hoped for by its proponents; but it is evident that after the expenditure of millions of dollars on this scheme there would be no saving in freight rates to the Middle West and Northwest.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, many of the Members have referred to the fact, as they see it, that this is an invasion of the rights of the Budget. I do not consider it as such, because we have just recently passed in this House a very meritorious bill, but one which if enacted into law will ultimately involve an expenditure of nearly $4,000,000,000 of the people's money, so it has been estimated, and it was not covered by the Budget. Very shortly there is to come into the House for your approval a bill involving some $200,000,000 more, the so-called roads bill, which is also, so I understand, not carried in the Budget, so this argument will not hold water.

I am in favor of this amendment because it is a work which is constructive, and therefore a work of peace. We have spent billions upon billions of dollars for war in the last five years. We have spent until it hurts, and I think it is now high time that as much of the people's money as possible be devoted to the constructive works of peace.

This is not a partisan matter. It is not a sectional matter. Both of the great parties in their campaign documents or platforms, issued in 1920, declared in favor of the improvement of our inland waterways, to wit, our rivers and harbors. I quote from the Republican platform:

WATERWAYS.

We declare it to be our policy to encourage and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States.

Turning to the Democratic platform I quote, as follows, under "Inland waterways":

Our present facilities for distribution by rail are inadequate and the promotion of transportation by water is imperative. We therefore favor a liberal and comprehensive policy for the development and utilization of our harbors and interior waterways.

Now, the distinguished Member from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], in whose opinion I have great confidence, states to you that our problems in America are entirely different from those that are presented in Europe. Only recently I made a trip of two months abroad, and I took particular pains to look into river and harbor transportation. I may say I am not altogether unfamiliar with this phase of work, having been educated in civil engineering and having spent 10 years in the practice of my profession, several years of which were spent in the development of rivers and harbors. I am convinced that the transportation problems of all great nations to-day are intricately and intimately involved in the development of their rivers and harbors. At this very moment the great Stiness group in Germany, in combination with four or five German States directly interested, are putting through the German Reichstag a bill to carry out a plan to connect the Rhine and Danube Rivers, and thereby further develop the great transportation systems that exist on those two rivers. If a bankrupt nation like Germany, owing billions of dollars of indemnity, can afford to consider such a constructive work as that in such a time as this, I insist that the American people, who have millions of dollars at their disposal where the Germans have thousands, can well afford to increase the appropriation to the maximum of $42,800,000, recommended by the Board of Army Engineers and the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, for carrying on this great work during the coming fiscal year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I never have voted for a river and harbor bill, and my reason for that is that I have never believed that the money appropriated for that purpose was expended under any proper system.

I am convinced that every dollar we appropriate for rivers and harbors is either wasted or expended in such a way under our present railroad system that they not only make us pay that money in taxes but my section of the country pays for it again in freight rates. I say to you that so long as the Interstate Commerce Commission are permitted by law or against law to enable a railroad paralleling a waterway to reduce freight rates to such an extent that there is no advantage in carrying the freight by water, my section of the country has to help keep up that railroad, and they pay double on that proposition. For that reason I shall never vote for a dollar for rivers and harbors until there is some definite policy and system agreed upon. And I want to say to you that I think more of my opinion to-day on that subject than I ever thought of it before, when a man like Mr. BURTON takes the floor here, a man who we will all admit knows more about rivers and harbors than any other man in this House, who had more to do with appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury for rivers and harbors than any other man—when he takes the floor and tells you that to appropriate money for rivers and harbors under the present system is to waste it.

Neither can I follow the policy advocated by my friend [Mr. HAYDEN]. He says, "I am in favor of appropriating money out of the Treasury to take things off a dead center and start the wheels of commerce to work." Just think of that policy. Assume now that he is willing to appropriate the money out of the Federal Treasury to start labor on rivers and harbors. I say that is just one step removed from the idea of appropriating money out of the Federal Treasury to pay men for not working. We can not bring about normalcy by appropriating out of the Federal Treasury money that we have not got to give some man a job. [Applause]. That doctrine is not sound. I want to be friendly to the waterways, but I do think that before we spend this money that we have not got we ought to get together on some business system. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the author of this system, has been fair and honest enough to come before this House this morning and tell us that it is a failure, and I say to you that I have always known it was a failure, and that any man who has kept track of these things, any man who has lived in the interior of this country who has witnessed the expenditure of the appropriations that have been made for rivers and harbors, no matter how friendly he is to them, can not help appreciating that that money has not only been taken from the taxpayer but that the ordinary taxpayer engaged in agriculture has had to pay it twice.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it would be absolutely impossible to discuss the river and harbor question in one minute, but I want to reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], and say that there were other eminent gentlemen in this House before his day, who came from that western country, who stood before this House and said that every dollar that had been expended for the improvement of rivers and harbors had been the best money this Government had ever expended. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, adequate and cheaper transportation is one of the most important questions before the American people to-day. The tremendous advance in rail rates since the beginning of the World War has imposed almost a crushing burden upon commerce; and particularly is this true with reference to the movement of agricultural products, building materials, and manufactures from the source of production to markets so greatly in need of them.

It is, perhaps, not too much to say that high transportation rates have been one of the chief contributing factors to the existing economic and industrial depression throughout the country. The farmer wants to sell his products at a fair price to the consumer in the cities, and the consumer wants to buy them. But when the products of the farm reach the city and finally find their way to the consumer, the farmer finds that his profit has disappeared and been largely absorbed by high transportation costs, while the consumer buys sparingly because of the increased price which he must pay to make up such high transportation and other charges assessed before the goods reach him.

In fact, in many instances the situation has become so acute that producers who have raised fine crops have found it unprofitable to ship them, because when the returns were made, after paying transportation charges to market, there was practically nothing left for the shipper.

The same thing is true with reference to raw and finished materials of every kind needed throughout all communities of the United States to-day, but which can not be purchased at reasonable prices owing, in no small measure, to the costs of transportation, especially with reference to bulk commodities. This is a matter of common knowledge. While there is no doubt that other factors enter into the final high costs of commodities before they reach the consumer, yet it is undoubtedly true that the high transportation costs are one of the most important factors in reducing the return to the producer and increasing the price to the consumer.

Since the beginning of March, 1918, freight rates on the railroads of the United States have increased from 65 to 80 per cent. These increases, as shown by the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission since the 1st of March, 1918, reflect, first, a 15 per cent increase; then, later in the same year, a 25 per cent increase under General Order 28; finally, in 1920, a still further increase of from 25 to 40 per cent under Ex parte 74. The increases brought about in intrastate or so-called "State" rates were even greater than the advances noted in interstate rates, because under the transportation act, which I may state I opposed, control practically of all State rates, as well as interstate, was granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which sustained the railroads in advancing State rates to the level of interstate rates when such State rates were prior to such time usually far below the level of interstate rates.

It is further a matter of common knowledge to the people of the United States that under normal conditions the rail transportation system of the United States was totally inadequate to move the great amount of commerce seeking transportation. In fact, before the present agricultural and industrial depression began a little over a year ago there was such a congestion upon the railroads and such a shortage of equipment to handle the commerce necessary to be transported that priority orders were issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission and tremendous losses suffered by those who sold commodities and could not move them for lack of transportation facilities.

No one will seriously contend that when prosperity returns the rail transportation facilities will not again be found inadequate to take care of the commerce which is offered, even under conditions of high transportation rates, which the country is firmly convinced ought to be reduced if the return of prosperity is not to be still further delayed.

The importance, therefore, of utilizing the great water transportation facilities of the Nation has never been more clearly demonstrated and the need for their proper development more cogently emphasized.

In fact, Congress itself has only comparatively recently made a declaration to this effect in the transportation act. Section 500 of that law provides as follows:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation service and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Section 8 of the merchant marine act, passed by Congress in 1920, also declares a similar policy, such section reading as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the board, in cooperation with the Secretary of War, with the object of promoting, encouraging, and developing ports and transportation facilities in connection with water commerce over which it has jurisdiction, to investigate territorial regions and zones tributary to such ports, taking into consideration the economies of transportation by rail, water, and highway and the natural direction of the flow of commerce; to investigate the causes of the congestion of commerce at ports and the remedies applicable thereto; to investigate the subject of water terminals, including the necessary docks, warehouses, apparatus, equipment, and appliances in connection therewith, with a view to devising and suggesting the types most appropriate for different locations and for the most expeditious and economical transfer or interchange of passengers or property between carriers by water and carriers by rail; to advise with communities regarding the appropriate location and plan of construction of wharves, piers, and water terminals; to investigate the practicability and advantages of harbor, river, and port improvements in connection with foreign and coastwise trade; and to investigate any other matter that may tend to promote and encourage the use by vessels of ports adequate to care for the freight which would naturally pass through such ports: Provided, That if after such investigation the board shall be of the opinion that rates, charges, rules, or regulations of common carriers by rail subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission are detrimental to the declared object of this section, or that new rates, charges, rules, or regulations, new or additional port terminal facilities, or affirmative action on the part of such common carriers by rail is necessary to promote the objects of this section, the board may submit its findings to the Interstate Commerce Commission for such action as such commission may consider proper under existing law.

During the World War and for some considerable time after the armistice, river and harbor work by the Government was very much curtailed, not only by reason of concentration of the resources of the Nation upon the single purpose of winning the war but also by reason of the increased costs of such work and inadequate appropriations.

In fact, the costs of doing such work mounted so rapidly that in the river and harbor act of March 2, 1919, Congress provided that—

No work shall be undertaken upon any new project herein adopted unless the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that, based upon the cost at the time of entering upon the work, the project can be completed at a cost not greater than 40 per cent in excess of the estimate of cost in the report upon such project.

The Chief of Engineers of the Army and the corps of officers in charge of river and harbor work were not only careful to follow this limitation imposed by Congress but, of their own accord, exercised the utmost economy to the extent even of delaying much work upon projects which were of the greatest magnitude and which would otherwise have been prosecuted with the utmost dispatch, to the end that the facilities needed would have been provided at the earliest possible moment.

General Taylor, Assistant Chief of Engineers, in his testimony before the Appropriations Committee at the hearings on this bill, said:

There is another and very important consideration. During the past few years our conditions have been such that we could not spend money economically. On account of the fact that our appropriations were continuing appropriations we did not feel it was necessary to spend the money as soon as it was appropriated, and we held on to it until we could spend it economically. This last year, of course, our expenditures have been far greater than the appropriations.

Through the exercise of such economy and conservation of river and harbor funds the Government engineers were able last year to make most advantageous contracts and carry on many river and harbor operations at reasonable prices, which were vitally necessary and which could not have been undertaken with the insufficient appropriation provided that year had it not been possible to have drawn upon the reserves in the river and harbor fund remaining unexpended by reason of the economies practiced.

General Taylor stated it was not possible to keep up even with the maintenance and improvement work necessary to maintain the important projects. General Beach, the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and his assistant, General Taylor, have repeatedly asserted that the minimum amount necessary this year for river and harbor work is $42,815,661. In this connection General Taylor testified:

I wish to again emphasize the fact that the Engineer Department has never stated or admitted that any sum less than the $42,000,000 would be sufficient for the next year for river and harbor work. The estimates have been cut down over our repeated recommendations, and we believe that more money is necessary.

He further testified that if only $27,635,260 were appropriated it would mean cutting down by about 50 per cent the work that was absolutely necessary to be done upon the more important projects already authorized by law.

He further testified that—every bit of river and harbor work we do next year will be done with the money which is appropriated at this time. I want to make that very plain, that when the previous bills went through we had large sums which we could utilize for those years for which the appropriations were made, and that this year we have no money available to help out next year.

During such examination the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations, Mr. ANTHONY, asked this question:

About how much of these permanent appropriations will be unexpended?

To which General Taylor replied:

There will be practically nothing that is unexpended; on the 1st of December our actual unexpended balance was $28,324,247.89. Of that amount $9,774,165.13 was under contract or obligated, leaving us an unobligated balance on the 1st of December of $18,550,082.76.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the amount which will probably be carried over into the next year?

General TAYLOR. No, sir; that was what we had on hand on the 1st of December, 1921. We have been expending funds at the rate of about $2,500,000 a month.

As the period of time from the 1st of December, 1921, to June 30, 1922, the end of the fiscal year, is seven months, it is apparent that without anything for contingencies $17,500,000 would be used, which would, at most, leave only $1,000,000 to which during such period recourse might be made for such sums as would be required to meet unforeseen and unexpected emergency needs.

Prior to the appropriations made in the river and harbor acts of 1920 and 1921 appropriation of specific sums to designated projects had been made by Congress, and when so made such funds could not be diverted by the Chief of Engineers of the Army or other executive officer to any other river and harbor project. In this way considerable sums of money accumulated in different projects where work had been delayed owing to high costs and inability to obtain material or equipment necessary, so that even though only $15,000,000 was carried in the river and harbor act of 1921, it was yet possible for the Chief of Engineers to carry on any pay for improvements vitally necessary which cost $41,241,503.95; but even then the engineers testified, by General Taylor, that although something over 500 river and harbor projects have been authorized work at the present time is being prosecuted on less than 100 of them.

It is therefore apparent that when the Chief of Engineers points out that he has already cut down the estimates of the district engineers from $63,000,000 to $42,815,661, and that there is no other source from which this money can be obtained than an appropriation carried in this bill; that unless it is provided the work of maintaining and preserving what has already been decreed by Congress to be absolutely essential to commerce can not be carried on.

It will be of interest to many who are not acquainted with the development of river and harbor projects to learn that the cost of the recent operation of the railroads to the Government during the period of Federal control was greater than the total amount invested by the Government in rivers and harbors since such work was started in 1824, nearly a hundred years ago, and that since the railroads were returned to private ownership nearly $500,000,000 has been paid out to the railroads in guaranties under the transportation act and an even greater sum with the increased freight rates which the public must pay under the 6 per cent return provision of the transportation act, costing the people in five years double what rivers and harbors have cost in a hundred years.

And yet, in spite of these enormous expenditures and payments for railroad transportation in the last few years, it has not been contended that railroad transportation should be crippled, suspended, or abandoned.

The return which the waterways, including the great harbors, of this country have made to the public upon the amount invested therein will perhaps never fully be realized.

Where great harbors have been constructed to serve a vast expanse of territory tributary thereto which previously was compelled to ship its commodities to far greater distances at increased costs in order to get them to a seaport for shipment to foreign markets, the greater returns to producers for their products by reason of lower freight rates not only to such newer harbors but to older ones as well, by reason of competition, has resulted in the saving of many millions of dollars to the agricultural interests of the United States.

A case in point might be illustrated by the port of Galveston, now rated by the Department of Commerce as the second port in the United States in 1921 in the value of exports. In December, 1908, Col. John C. Oakes, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, in a special report to the Chief of Engineers transmitted to Congress, made the following impressive statement:

> The total amount expended by the United States on this work to January 1, 1909, is $10,419,673.59. A board of engineers stated in its report of December 19, 1902, that a saving of $10,000,000 per annum as a result of the completed improvement to the territory adjacent to the port would be a conservative estimate. The saving of that amount on the commerce passing through Galveston alone can be shown without taking into consideration the saving resulting to the people by reduced rates to all other ports competing with Galveston. I have no doubt if a careful study be made of this question a saving of $20,000,000 per annum could certainly be shown, and possibly $30,000,000.

In a recent special report transmitted to me by the Chief of Engineers the following observation occurs:

> It would be difficult to estimate, except in a very general way, the value to the country at large of the development of Galveston Harbor. The marked development of the Southwest and the enlarged market therein which has followed that improvement, and the tremendous saving in freight rates on southwestern products over a term of years, may serve to answer briefly this phase of Mr. Briggs's inquiry.

It is a matter also of tremendous interest to note that soon after the completion, in 1897, of the jetties at Galveston, which was the plan adopted for assuring deep water, the wheat export rate from Kansas City to Galveston declined from 21 cents a hundred pounds on November 2, 1896, to 10 cents a hundred pounds on April 9, 1899, while the export rate on corn between the same points and dates declined from 18 cents to 10 cents a hundred pounds. The influence of the establishment of the great port of Galveston was not only reflected in the tremendous reduction in export rates on grain from Kansas City and intermediate territory to Galveston, but also resulted in a marked reduction in rates on grain from Kansas City to the Atlantic seaboard, which declined from 33 cents a hundred pounds to New York on November 2, 1896, to 24½ cents a hundred pounds on April 19, 1899, and from 27 cents a hundred pounds to Baltimore on November 2, 1896, to 21½ cents on April 19, 1899.

Although, as previously stated, railroad rates since the World War have advanced enormously all over the country, yet as a result of the competition for the great grain export haul moving particularly from the Middle West to seaports, there was recently granted a reduction in the grain rate of from 5½ cents to 7½ cents a hundred pounds.

The significance of this reduction will further be appreciated when it is realized that the saving by reason of such reduction, inuring to the benefit of the grain producers of this Nation, amounted to the large sum of $30,400,284.70 on the 92,122,075 bushels reported by the Chief of Engineers to have moved through the port of Galveston for export during the year 1921.

This saving in freight rates of $30,400,284.70 on grain shipments from Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Texas, and other States through Galveston was increased by the savings on the other 189,000,000 bushels of grain exported through other ports of the United States, which amounted to at least $75,000,000 more.

During the year 1921 the grain crop raised in the United States was such a huge one and was gathered so rapidly that the necessity for the most expeditious and rapid transportation for delivery of wheat sold abroad was especially acute. Grain elevators and warehouses in the interior of the country were filled to overflowing and much of the crop was threatened with deterioration if railroad cars could not be secured and the grain be moved to ship side with the greatest expedition. In fact, the losses experienced by the grain farmers of Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and elsewhere in failing to secure promptly an adequate number of grain cars are sufficiently well known to require no review, and had it not been for the magnificent harbors developed by the Government, like those at Galveston, Texas City, and elsewhere, it would have been impossible to have provided, when most needed, a sufficient amount of large ocean tonnage able to carry in an almost uninterrupted stream of ships the vast amount of grain which poured forth from the grain fields to the ports. At Galveston alone last season 526 cars of grain were unloaded and handled in a single day. This would have made 10 trainloads of over 50 cars each. Over 3,000,000 bales of cotton, principally from Texas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma, also moved in export through the port of Galveston during the year 1921, more than through any other port in the world, besides large quantities of cottonseed cake, sulphur, oil, and miscellaneous cargo.

Of course, immense volumes of commerce likewise moved through other great ports of the Nation and over the inland waterways, including the Great Lakes.

It is not always easy to grasp, without considerable study and investigation, just what a tremendous return and dividend the development of the great waterways and harbors of the United States has paid to the people of the Nation generally. But the instances cited are sufficient to show how one great harbor, that of Galveston, in one year more than repaid the total cost of its development to the people of our country through reductions in freight rates which would otherwise not have been granted.

The necessity, therefore, of maintaining and developing the waterways and harbors of our country is one that is becoming increasingly important to commerce and those interested in every class of industry throughout the whole Union.

Practically since the year 1824 the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army have, under the Secretary of War, directed the river and harbor improvement undertaken by the Government, and with a high sense of fidelity to the interests of the Nation. During such long experience the Army Engineers have acquired a most intimate knowledge of river and harbor projects and are in the best position to know the actual minimum required to carry on the maintenance and improvement of the river and harbor work already authorized. The Bureau of the Budget confesses that it had no expert knowledge of the amount necessary for this work, but that its estimate was the best it was able to make under such conditions. It is therefore the proper and wise course to adopt the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, which is embodied in the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LARSON].

Mr. LARSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors increasing the proposed appropriation to $42,815,652. I am frank to say that such was my intention before I came on the floor of the House to-day. But I came to this discussion with an open mind. I wanted to hear the arguments for and against the amendment. I was ready and willing to vote against the amendment if cogent reasons were submitted showing that the amendment should not prevail. But no such reasons have been presented. The proponents of the amendment have presented their case with persuasive efficacy.

Loose talk has been indulged in against the amendment that this is a raid upon the Treasury; that this is "pork-barrel" legislation. I shall not allow myself to be stampeded by such loose charges, unsupported by evidence. [Applause.] If there be any "pork" in this amendment, show it. Let us see where it is and what it looks like. Present your bill of particulars and produce your evidence. That no proof of "pork" has been shown convinces me that the charge is baseless.

Neither shall I give any credence to the innuendo that the supporters of the amendment are actuated by selfish and sinister motives. Simply because a Member of this House happens to have a navigable waterway in his district does not militate against the cogency of his arguments. Such a Member's argument should be more persuasive and convincing, because his intimate study qualifies him to speak with authority on the value of waterways as arteries of the Nation's commerce. Such Members know the facts, and it is upon facts, not upon prejudices or unfounded insinuations, that Congress should legislate.

I have the honor to represent a district that contains one of the largest and best harbors not only in the United States but in the entire world—the Duluth-Superior Harbor. It carries annually a commerce of some 50,000,000 tons, of the value of about half a billion dollars. Whether this amendment prevails or is defeated, ample Government funds will be obtained so as not to jeopardize the immmense commerce of the Duluth-Superior Harbor; and if Uncle Sam should refuse to supply the funds, we have enough public-spirited people in Duluth who will contribute the necessary amount. [Applause.]

So the imputation of legislating for the sole benefit of a local waterway project can not be made against me. I am happily in a position to view this legislation from the viewpoint of the benefit that will result to the country as a whole, and that is the viewpoint, I am sure, of the membership of this House. We are elected by our respective districts, but as Congressmen we legislate for the entire Nation. We are not the representatives in this lawmaking body of any section, class, or interest, but of the whole American people. That is my political philosophy, so clearly and convincingly expressed by Edmund Burke in his famous address to the electors of Bristol in these words:

> Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests, which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but Parliament is a deliberative assembly of our nation, with one interest—that of the whole—where not local purposes, not local prejudices, ought to guide, but the general good resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member, indeed, but when you have chosen him he is not a member of Bristol but he is a member of Parliament.

The legislation under discussion involves one of the most important and vital problems now confronting the American people—the transportation problem. It is not a sectional, State, district, or parochial question. Transportation affects the happiness and prosperity of every inhabitant of our common country. It affects everything bought or sold by any individual. It determines the progress or decline of our cities. It measures the progress of the Nations' commerce, domestic and foreign. Any nation that neglects to develop its transportation becomes a decadent nation.

We are a rich Nation, the richest in all the world, but unless we successfully solve our transportation problem, so that the producer can adequately and cheaply transport his products to the consumer, the United States will lose her present preeminent position among the commercial nations of the world. This is no foreboding prompted by morbid pessimism; it is a bald statement of the actual situation now confronting the Nation.

Experienced railroad men and financiers admit that the railroads can not handle the Nation's commerce. The load is too big for the railroads. They can not raise the billions of dollars needed to enlarge their equipment. But even if they could, the railroads, unassisted by the waterways, would not be able to cope with the ever-growing commerce created by the Nation's producers.

The lack of adequate and cheap transportation is seriously threatening the development of our commerce. It is an acute problem which demands a prompt remedy. A transportation emergency confronts the Nation. Listen to what Mr. Elisha Lee, vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, said in a recent address before the Manufacturers' Association in Philadelphia:

> The next time our country has a real revival in business we shall, in all probability, be confronted with the most severe congestion of railroad traffic and the greatest inadequacy of railroad facilities ever experienced in our history.
> When that happens, rates will be lost sight of. Everyone will be clamoring for service, and our public highways will again be torn to pieces by huge truck loads of freight, carried over roadways never designed for such purposes, and at rates and costs of operation so high as to constitute gross economic waste.
>
> Nothing could more quickly check a wave of prosperity than the inability of our railroad facilities to handle the traffic which good times would create.
> I am firmly convinced that we face such a condition, with almost absolute certainty, in the not remote future. Whether it will come within a year or two or be deferred for several years I do not for a moment assume to predict, but, unless the world plunges into hopeless economic chaos, in which case all reckoning will be wrong, we are going to push up our national figures for production, and consequently of potential railroad traffic, beyond anything ever known before in peace times, and, in all likelihood, even beyond the levels reached during the war.
> Then business men will not be bothering themselves very much about rates. All they will be thinking about will once more be how to get transportation at any price.

What is the remedy? The only remedy is the development of our waterways, our rivers and harbors, with which nature has so generously endowed us. Instead of the amount provided for in the pending amendment, I would like to see it doubled, and then some. Why quibble over the appropriation of a few million dollars when a lack of transportation facilities threatens the growth and prosperity of the country? To refuse any relief to the commerce of the country on the grounds of supposed party expediency would be a political blunder. The transportation emergency calls for wise and courageous statesmanship, the application of sound business principles.

The opponents of the amendment say that the amount proposed by the Committee on Appropriations for the maintenance and improvement of our rivers and harbors for the coming fiscal year is ample. This statement is squarely challenged by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. General Taylor, as the representative of the Board of Engineers, testified as follows at the hearing held before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors:

> I personally went over all of those items. (Items of the needs for rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30.) The reports as they originally came in from the district engineers contained amounts considerably greater than those. The total of the amounts submitted by the district engineers was about $63,000,000. I went over those with a great deal of care and eliminated everything from the statement that I thought could be reasonably deferred. In other words, the amounts now in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers which total $42,815,652, represented the amount which, in my judgment, was as small as should be appropriated in order that the work could be carried on to a reasonable extent. In other words, I cut it to what I consider the absolute limit. I went over it with a great deal of care. I realized that Congress wished to have the appropriations cut as much as possible, and I did the best I could to carry out that intent of Congress.

There are about 125 items involved. It is impossible for the Members of this House to investigate personally the merits of each of those 125 items. Under the circumstances, what are we to do? Speaking for myself, I shall accept the judgment of the United States Engineer Corps as to the amount of the appropriation needed, rather than the say-so of the Committee on Appropriations, which of necessity has been able to give the merits of the various items only a brief, cursory, and superficial consideration.

Common sense suggests that the thing for us to do under the circumstances is to follow the sound judgment of the men who know. A distinguished Member of this House, justly reputed to be the greatest authority in this country on waterways, characterized the United States Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, whose business it is to inform Congress regarding the various waterway projects for which governmental appropriations are sought as the "blue ribbon of the Government service." I think we may safely follow the judgment of men whose skill and character are of such high order as to merit so lofty an encomium from so great an authority.

To vote for this amendment is no attack on the administration's program of economy. I believe in economy in the expenditure of public funds, but economy does not mean the refusal to appropriate for necessary public improvements. On the contrary, such refusal means waste. Properly understood, the increased appropriation proposed would result in an economical administration of the Government's work on our rivers and harbors, and the inadequate appropriation proposed by the Committee on Appropriations would result in waste, as General Taylor made clear in his testimony before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Let us not lose sight of the fact that there are at the present time some 5,000,000 people out of employment in this country. That not only means want and suffering on the part of the unemployed and those dependent upon them but it also means an irreparable loss of human energy, which is the Nation's most valuable asset. The enlarged appropriation will give opportunity for employment to thousands now unemployed. Why wait to develop our public improvements when labor will be sorely needed in the prosecution of commercial and industrial enterprises by individuals?

The increased appropriation proposed by the amendment will, I feel confident, meet with the hearty approval of the President. He appreciates the vital importance of transportation to the growth and progress of the country. He fully sympathizes with the farmers and manufacturers throughout the country, and particularly of the Middle West and the Northwest in their demand for ample and cheap transportation. He realizes with Bacon that—

> There be three things which make a nation great and prosperous—a fertile soil, busy workshops, and easy conveyance for men and commodities from one place to another.

The President not only favors the improvement of our strictly inland waterways, but also of our great boundary waterway—the St. Lawrence River. Listen to what this forward-looking statesman said before the farmers' conference recently held in Washington on the importance to our Nation of undertaking the improvement of this Great Lakes to the ocean waterway:

> I have spoken of the advantage which Europe enjoys because of its easy access to the sea, the cheapest and surest transportation facility. In our own country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland. The heart of the continent, with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry, would be brought in communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. To enable ocean-going vessels to have access to all ports of the Great Lakes would have a most stimulating effect upon the industrial life of the continent's interior.
> The feasibility of the project is unquestioned, and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small. Disorganized and prostrate, the nations of central Europe are even now setting their hands to the development of great continental waterways, which, connecting the Rhine and Danube, will bring water transportation from the Black to the North Sea, from Mediterranean to Baltic. If nationalistic prejudice and economic difficulties can be overcome by Europe, they certainly should not be formidable obstacles to an achievement less expensive and giving promise of yet greater advantages to the peoples of North America. Not only would the cost of transportation be greatly reduced, but a vast population would be brought overnight in immediate touch with the markets of the entire world.

Mr. Harding's indorsement of the St. Lawrence route is another evidence of the truism that in the last analysis we are governed by enlightened public opinion, of which the President is the chief spokesman.

I venture the prophecy that the Harding administration will be remembered and blessed by posterity not only for promoting lasting peace and good will among the nations of the world, but also for the execution of the St. Lawrence River project, this great international project which promises unlimited benefits in solving the transportation problem of central North America, as well as the fuel and power crisis of the eastern seaboard.

In this connection I desire to incorporate as a part of my remarks a very instructive and illuminating consideration of the proposed St. Lawrence route, which appears in a report submitted to the executive committee of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts. While it relates specifically to the St. Lawrence project, in it is considered the transportation needs of the country and the solution therefor. I am reliably informed that the report is the result of the efforts of some of the best minds of New England—engineers, maritime experts, financiers, and captains of industry. I commend this report to the thoughtful consideration of all those who are looking for a real solution of the Nation's transportation problem, and particularly to those of my fellow citizens of New York who have not yet seen the light. [Applause.]

To the Executive Committee of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts:

GENTLEMEN: Your committee, appointed to consider and report upon the feasibility and desirability of the St. Lawrence project, begs leave herewith to submit its unanimous report.

Our conclusions, reasons for which will be set forth in this statement, are:

(a) That the project is feasible from an engineering standpoint;

(b) That it can be constructed at a reasonable cost, considering the magnitude of the work involved;

(c) That it will furnish direct and usable water route between the ports of the Great Lakes and both foreign and domestic ocean ports;

(d) That in the very near future this Nation will require every possible means of transportation, and that accordingly the St. Lawrence project will be of great assistance in reducing otherwise necessary expenditures for additions to our rail facilities and greatly lessen the inevitable transportation crisis which will arise with a restoration of normal business and the natural growth of the country;

(e) That it will give to New York and New England a very large, reliable, and cheap source of hydroelectric energy; and

(f) That the project is desirable for the country as a whole and beneficial to New England.

The St. Lawrence project is a project for making navigable the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario, thus making it feasible upon the completion of the New Welland Canal around Niagara Falls, for the largest lake vessels to pass from the Great Lakes to tidewater and for ocean-going vessels, drawing not more than 23 and ultimately 28 feet, to pass in and out of the Great Lakes.

By act of the Governments of Canada and the United States a joint commission of the two nations has been investigating the feasibility and cost of the project. This commission has recently submitted its report to the two Governments. Its findings are that the project is feasible, desirable, and reasonable in cost. The estimates of cost were made by Government engineers of the two nations after an exhaustive examination extending over a year's time. These engineers estimate a cost of $252,000,000 for the development of this project, according to plans which they submit. This estimate includes the cost of producing 1,464,000 horsepower of continuous energy. The figures were based upon 1920 costs—as an example, concrete is estimated at $12 per yard. It is further the express belief of the engineers and of the commission that the figures of cost are conservative and that due allowance has been made for inevitable contingencies. It is true that these figures of cost have been challenged by some people, including engineers of standing, but we are constrained to place substantial reliance upon estimates made by the Joint International Boundary Commission and its engineers, arrived at after many months of study and of careful examination of the river and the surrounding country. We may add, however, that if further study indicates a total cost materially higher than the present estimates, this fact would not by itself cause us to change our conclusions as to the advisability of the project.

All of our conclusions in this matter are based upon an assumption that by treaty or other international agreement provision will be made for the adequate protection of the equitable rights of both Canada and the United States, and for the joint control of the enterprise during and after construction, so that its use by nationals of both countries shall be without discrimination; and upon the further assumption that by law or otherwise suitable provision shall be made for equitable distribution of the power produced by the project in all parts of the territory tributary to the power houses.

We make no recommendations as to the specific plan of development to be adopted, recognizing that many changes are likely to be made in the plan as presented by the engineers. Nor do we express any opinion as to whether the project shall be constructed and operated by private or by public agencies, or by a combination of both.

The project has two principal aspects; that of navigation and that of power. It needs no proof that transportation by water is materially cheaper than by rail. This fact is well known. With the opening of the St. Lawrence River so that large vessels can go from Lake ports to tidewater at Montreal, Halifax, and Atlantic coast ports of the United States, this cheaper method of transportation will become available for traffic between tidewater and the interior. This traffic now amounts to 200,000,000 tons annually. Of course, not all of it will ever use the water route. But bulk commodities from the interior destined for the Eastern States or for export will tend to move that way, and many New England products destined for the interior will avail themselves of the cheaper route. The rail rate for the entire country is now approximately 12.1 mills per ton-mile. If coal is excluded this average rate rises to 13 mills. Water rates on the Great Lakes average less than 1 mill per ton-mile; and on the ocean they vary according to the class of freight from 1 to 3 mills. Probably 2 mills per ton-mile is a fair water rate to compare with an average rail rate of 15 mills.

From Chicago to Boston the rail distance is 1,034 miles, as against 2,682 by water. From Duluth the corresponding distances are 1,513 and 2,775. And taking into account relative rail and water rates and relative distances, it would seem that a ton of freight is now hauled by rail from Chicago to Boston for $15.51, as against an estimated charge of $5.36 by the water route. The corresponding rail rate for Duluth is $22.70, as against an estimated rate of $5.55 by water. Figures based on averages may not be exact, but they do indicate tendencies, and they certainly give to your committee assurances that freight can be carried from the Middle West to Atlantic ports by water much cheaper than by rail.

The promoters of the project expect to see lake ports crowded with ocean-going vessels when once the river is opened, transporting their products in unbroken cargoes to foreign markets and bringing to the interior of this continent the goods of the world. There is difference of opinion among ocean shipping men as to whether the present types of ocean-going vessels will go up the river to lake ports. Our conclusion that the project is worthy of adoption is not based at all upon an assumption that the existing type of trans-Atlantic vessels will ply the Great Lakes, although we do state our conviction that if sufficient economic advantages are to be gained by carrying unbroken cargoes between lake ports and foreign ports a type of vessel will be developed which can perform the required service. We find justification for the project, considered from the point of view of transportation, in relative costs of rail and water traffic between tidewater and the interior.

At present a bushel of wheat is carried by water from either Chicago or Duluth 1,000 miles to Buffalo for 2 cents or less; and on the same mileage basis, with due allowance for delays in canals and locks, 3 or 3½ cents would be a fair rate to Montreal. The lowest rate at which grain can now be carried from the above-mentioned western ports to tidewater is 2 cents to Buffalo and 12 cents from Buffalo to New York or Boston, a total of 14 cents. This shows a saving to tidewater of at least 10 cents per bushel via the St. Lawrence route, and as ocean rates from New York and Montreal to Liverpool are the same this means an equal saving on the through rate. What holds true of grain will also hold true of many other western products destined for European ports.

It is a well-recognized economic principle that the price of any commodity in general use is determined by the price at which the surplus of that product must be sold. The surplus grain of the world is sold in Liverpool. To this market is shipped the surplus grain from the United States, Canada, Argentina, Russia, and Australia, and there in competition the world price of grain is established. The price there established governs not only the grain sold in the Liverpool market but all the grain sold in the producing countries. The price in the producing country is therefore the world price set in the Liverpool market less the cost of transportation between the farm and the English Channel, and the American farmer receives each year for all of his grain, wherever it may be consumed, the Liverpool price less the freight from his farm to Liverpool.

In the St. Lawrence project there is clearly indicated, therefore, an economic improvement in the condition of the American farmer which may well total scores of millions annually. Every other grain-producing region of the world which has an export surplus lies within 250 miles of navigation. Our grain region lies from 1,000 to 1,200 miles from the coast, and this great handicap upon our western farmers is the principal reason for their insistence—to use the words of the President—that "the salted and unsalted seas be connected by a suitable channel."

The maintenance of a healthy and prosperous agriculture in this country is of paramount importance. Without it we may not expect prosperity in other industries. The past year has brought home to us this fact, well known before. The United States and Canada are destined to contain a much greater population than at present. It is no flight of the imagination to assume 75,000,000 people in the territory tributary to the Great Lakes where there are now 40,000,000. Every feasible outlet to the sea is demanded for those who are now there and for their constantly increasing numbers. Rail tonnage of the United States has almost doubled every 10 years for the last 40 years. In 1890 our railroad traffic was 79,000,000,000 ton-miles; in 1900 it was 141,000,000,000; in 1905 it had increased to 187,000,000,000; and in 1920 it was 448,000,000,000. This shows a steady increase and indicates a ton mileage of 800,000,000,000 by the time the project can be completed. Rail facilities have not kept up with this increase during recent years. The cost of furnishing rail facilities equal to the demands to be placed upon them in the near future is very large. We are firmly of the opinion that by the time the St. Lawrence project can be completed it will be welcomed by the railroads themselves as giving them some relief from a volume of business which they will be unable to handle. In fact, we find no opinion among railroad officials that the St. Lawrence project will injure the railroads and no concerted opposition from them.

Objections are offered that the route will be little used when available. We are not impressed with such forebodings. Such arguments were presented with relation to the Panama Canal, the Manchester Ship Canal, and in fact they are a stock argument. But we firmly hold the belief that this route being in the line of a large and constantly increasing tonnage movement to and from the interior of the continent will be used and that the cheaper transportation it will afford will be of great advantage directly or indirectly, but none the less truly, to a large part of the people of the United States. It will be a route available during no more than seven or eight months in the year. But under similar circumstances a shipping industry has been developed on the Great Lakes during the last generation which now carries 100,000,000 tons a year. A closed season of weeks or months has not prevented a large use during the open season of rivers, canals, and arms of the sea in northern Europe. It will not prevent a similar use of the St. Lawrence. It is urged against the project that Lake harbors will require deepening; that Lake boats can not navigate salt waters; that ocean boats will not ascend the river. Undoubtedly there is much of fact in these assertions. But to us they are of small or no fundamental importance. Those things will correct themselves as experience teaches and as economic necessity requires. We do not deem them of serious weight either because of their character or because of any cost involved in their correction.

Another assertion offered as an objection to the project is that fogs in the lower St. Lawrence and beyond the Gulf of St. Lawrence present a serious obstacle to navigation. Fogs exist in the lower St. Lawrence, but the hydrographic charts of the Federal Governent indicate that the fog belt between Montreal and Liverpool is of less extent than that between New York and Liverpool. Moreover, it does not seem necessary to do more than point out the fact that fogs and ice have not prevented Montreal from becoming the second port of export in North America.

One feature of the method of the development of the St. Lawrence recommended by the Joint International Boundary Commission and by their engineers is the construction of a large dam on the river near Cornwall, N. Y. This dam will drown out one of the three principal rapids between Lake Ontario and Montreal. It will also develop 1,464,000 horsepower of continuous energy, one-half of which will be available for use in the United States. The area within which it is feasible to distribute this power includes New York State and all of New England except northern and eastern Maine. We find that there will thus be available for New York State and nearly all of New England a large amount of power, the cost of which will be materially less than the cost of power from coal generated under the most favorable conditions in New England.

Your committee is informed that private capital stands ready to develop 2,400,000 horsepower on the international section of the river by means of two dams and their appropriate locks at a cost of approximately $300,000,000, and with a provision that the Governments will either pay for or guarantee interest on about $50,000,000 of the above cost as recompense for the construction and maintenance of the navigation works. Such an offer by responsible parties should be given most careful consideration. Such a plan would materially lessen the amount which the two Governments would be required to invest and would leave to Government financing only the said $50,000,000 plus the $80,000,000 required for the two lower canals. Such a plan would also develop on the international section about 2,400,000 horsepower instead of the 1,464,000 horsepower suggested in the Government engineers' plans. The total power which is capable of development upon the St. Lawrence is equivalent to that to be produced by 30,000,000 tons of coal, the mining and distribution of which takes the continuous labor of 100,000 men. It is thus apparent that the project is in fact of vast importance from the point of view of conservation of both resources and labor. It is not yet determined what proportion of the total carrying charges of the whole project shall be borne by navigation and what proportion by the power development, or whether the whole cost shall be borne by the power. We express the firm conviction that the carrying charges should be divided between navigation and power. But even if the whole of these charges were supported by the power development, it is clear to us that hydroelectric power from the dam or dams or near Cornwall can be produced at no greater cost than would be the cost of power produced from coal at the mouth of the mine and transmitted to central stations in New England. This indicates a saving at least equal to the total freight charges upon coal from the mines to the consumer.

In arriving at this conclusion we have taken into account amounts necessary to operate all of the navigation works of the whole project, to develop the power at Cornwall, interest upon the investment, and a sinking fund to extinguish the capital cost within a reasonable period. Moreover, as the original cost is extinguished by the sinking fund, the cost of power will decrease while coal costs are likely in the long run to increase. Thus there will be a constant tendency in cost more and more in favor of the St. Lawrence power.

Honest fear has been expressed that the opening of the St. Lawrence River will ruin the business of the port of Boston and of other New England ports. In this fear we do not share. Buffalo is now the nearest lake or river port to Boston. It is 500 miles distant. From that port it is now all rail to Boston. With the opening of the river both Ogdensburg and Montreal, which are reached by New England roads, will bring water-borne traffic within a rail haul of only 250 miles to Boston. This rail haul is not enough to keep from Boston the bulk cargoes required by ocean vessels which have brought here for New England use the raw materials and goods of the world. Bulk cargoes are what they need for their return journeys. The lack of such bulk cargoes has kept them from New England ports. It seems clear to us that the opening of the St. Lawrence for the lake traffic will help to make available for New England ports the outgoing bulk freight which they must have if their foreign shipping is to prosper.

In addition to this, it seems clear to us that eventually there will be a very large amount of shipping between New England ports and the Great Lakes cities via the St. Lawrence.

The economic effects of the cheaper transportation and of the cheaper power to be afforded by this project are such as to vastly outweigh, in our unanimous judgment, the objections which have been offered against it. The cheaper transportation will affect not only the grain growers of the interior but also the people of the seaboard who ship large amounts of their manufactured goods to the territory tributary to the Lakes. The cheaper power will help to preserve the industries of the Eastern States. More transportation facilities and more power are urgently needed. It seems clear to us that this project will furnish both. And we welcome rather than fear joint international participation as tending toward international understandings and away from estrangements.

We are convinced that no true appraisal of this matter can be had unless the questions involved are approached from a national rather than a sectional point of view. If it is of advantage to the country as a whole, as we are firmly convinced that it is, no section of the country should oppose it, even though that section were to be adversely affected. So far as New England is concerned, however, it seems clear to us that the benefits outweight any disadvantages that may be urged.

We recommend, therefore, that the executive committee of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts give its approval to the project, to be carried out under such equitable arrangements as are indicated herein, and that the position of the Associated Industries of Massachusetts be presented to the Congress at the proper time. We express the hope that public opinion in New England will view this matter in the broad spirit of national interest to which we believe it to be entitled, and we suggest that the associated industries may well undertake to assist in creating here in Massachusetts a realization of the national advantages which may be expected to result from the development of the St. Lawrence River.

Respectfully submitted.

By unanimous consent Mr. LARSON of Minnesota, Mr. TREADWAY, and Mr. RUCKER were given leave to extend their remarks on the bill in the RECORD.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, estimates for annual appropriations for river and harbor improvement are first made by the district engineer officers located throughout the United States. For the fiscal year 1923 these estimates amounted to $60,000,000. The Chief of Engineers, in acting upon the estimates submitted by the district engineers, pared them down to approximately a total of $43,000,000. These estimates were then passed upon by the Budget Bureau, where they were again pared down, and, as submitted to Congress, amounted to $27,885,260. To this sum was added by the Committee on Appropriations $75,000, making the total $27,960,000 in the bill which is now before the House.

The Chief of Engineers does not think this amount is sufficient to properly carry on this work, but on all sides there is a great demand that all national expenditures shall be reduced, and I am in full accord with this feeling and determination, but at the same time it would be unwise to reduce appropriations to the point where for the want of funds the harbors of the country would be allowed to deteriorate. These harbors have been improved at a very great expense to the taxpayers, and it is of the utmost importance that there shall be available at all times sufficient funds to do the work required for maintenance and to complete existing projects.

I shall support the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to increase the appropriation to the amount he has asked for, because we have been advised by the Chief of Engineers that the entire amount of unexpended balance will have been wiped out by July 1. Unless we are largely guided by the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers there is no need for one. This officer tells us we must have more money for this purpose, else the harbors will rapidly deteriorate. I always favor reducing national expenditures when it is possible to do so, but in this case, unless more money is provided, the business and commerce of the country will suffer, and we can not afford to do anything that might retard prosperity, which they tell us is on the way.

Water transportation is one of the essential instrumentalities of the transportation system of any country, and the highways, railways, and waterways are all necessary to our commerce. In years gone by when these annual appropriation bills for improvement of rivers and harbors were under consideration they were very often severely criticized by some Members of the House, and justly so when they carried items that could not be used for transportation purposes. Long before I became a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I condemned the practice of making appropriations for small streams and rivers that had no commercial value. I saw that millions of dollars were wasted in this way, and I resolved that if I ever became a member of that committee I would vote against appropriating money for any purpose unless there was an absolute necessity for it. The navigable rivers and harbors should be amply provided for, but, as I have just stated, I fully agree with those who refuse to appropriate money for projects that have no real value or commercial importance.

One of the great harbors of the United States is at Savannah, Ga., in my district, and every member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee knows the commercial value and great importance of this harbor, just as they know the ports of New York, Boston, Galveston, San Francisco, and other like ports are valuable and indespensable assets to all the people of the United States.

The purpose of the rivers and harbors legislation in improvement of rivers and harbors is to afford additional facilities for transportation, and if there should be urged an appropriation which can not be used, or is not used for transportation purposes, such appropriations could not be justified and ought to have no place in the appropriation bill.

Right recently the Members of the House and Senate have been deluged with propaganda favoring what is commonly called the St. Lawrence project. From what I know of this project and what I have read about it I do not see how this Government could consider for a minute the advisability of engaging in such a stupendous enterprise.

About two years ago the Governments of the United States and Canada referred to an International Joint Commission certain questions relating to the improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Lake Ontario and Montreal for navigation and power. I shall not attempt now to discuss this measure, but at some other time I expect to do so. The report of this commission stated that it is a problem of exceptional magnitude and intricacy and one involving national and international interests of very great importance.

There is pending now before this Congress a bill to carry out the improvements proposed by this joint commission, and if the bill should pass it would involve very large expenditures by both Governments, and at a time when our people are already bearing a gigantic financial burden imposed by the greatest war in history. It has been estimated by competent engineers that to make that portion of the river navigable for deep-draft vessels of either lake or ocean going type and to produce the desired horsepower it would require an initial outlay of $250,000,000 besides the annual cost of maintenance, estimated at twenty-five million. In his address before the House the other day the President seemed to look with favor upon the project, and at some future time it may come before the House for consideration. The St. Lawrence River could not be made navigable the entire length for more than six or seven months in the year, because it is frozen over the balance of the time, and I would not favor spending such a vast sum of money in Canadian territory, especially when we are unable because of oppressive taxation to appropriate sufficient money to make adequate and desired improvements in the rivers and harbors of our own country. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, some of the Members of the House must have listened with surprise, as I did, to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] when he, in effect, announced that in so far as he was concerned he was virtually through with appropriations for rivers and other inland streams, and referred to a bale of cotton that went down the Mississippi and to the fact, as he said, that no other cotton went down. As I listened to the gentleman, I remembered a debate which took place in 1916 on this floor, and I also remembered a speech made by the gentleman from Ohio at the United States River and Harbor Congress in 1909. Referring to the railroads, the gentleman from Ohio said in the speech at that congress:

Then there is a second class of advantages that are arbitrary, due to their lowering of rates to drive waterways out of business. The best illustration with reference to that which I know is a case where a barge line on the Mississippi was carrying freight at 25 cents a hundred very profitably. The railways put down the rates at 10 cents a hundred until the barge line was driven out of business; then the railways put up the rates at 50 cents a hundred, where it has remained ever since. Now, that ought not to be allowed.

[Applause.]

The distinguished gentleman also said in the same speech:

It is really for the interest of both to work together. The time is coming when they will both see it.

[Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman further said:

I have found many observant and intelligent men who have an idea that a very large share of our appropriations go for insignificant creeks and streams. Now, perhaps, I might point out the benefit of improving many of these minor streams, a benefit which proportionately is often greater than even in the case of large rivers.

That is what he then thought. What a conversion is that of the gentleman from Ohio. Then he continued:

You have had to meet the idea that there is a pork barrel somewhere. Whenever there is a man of superficial information on this subject, or one who has had some project that has been turned down and turned down hard because it had to be turned down, that man begins to talk about the pork barrel.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, you have heard it charged to-day, as you hear it frequently charged, that the United States Government has been extravagant in the amount of its river and harbor expenditures. And, now, to refute that charge I read from a speech delivered by the gentleman from Ohio in a debate on this floor:

In 81 years (from 1814 to 1894, inclusive) France expended the sum of $300,000,000 on rivers and canals, inland navigation, and $200,000,000 for ports and harbors. For care and maintenance, France expended in the same time approximately $135,000,000 for inland navigation and $70,000,000 for ports and harbors, making a total in all of $705,000,000.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, France, about two-thirds the size of Texas, spent $700,000,000 on rivers and harbors and we, in the same time, spent $273,000,000 for all the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific and the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OVERSTREET] stated that a man not a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee was not so well qualified to judge of the situation, and I concede that; but inasmuch as I would have occupied the position which the distinguished gentleman from New York, the chairman, now occupies if I had remained on the committee, I trust I have more than a superficial knowledge of it. For many hours I have talked on this floor against this kind of a proposition. What happened in this country to bring about the Budget bill has been emphasized by this river and harbor bill. I made the prediction at the time that every man with every project that came in would insist that his project should have what they are asking for, a part of this $15,000,000 more, or 50 per cent more than the Budget appropriation, and that it would destroy the effect of the Budget bill. The Budget bill was enacted because of the pork-barrel feature of the river and harbor bill. The gentleman from Minnesota spoke about the harbor of Duluth. We have the same harbor in my home State, Superior, which has 50,000,000 tons of freight, as he says, the second largest harbor in the United States. The Mississippi River flows 100 miles past my district, but do you know there is not a line of boats along the Mississippi River to-day from the upper part down to St. Louis, or down to the mouth of the river, except one boat line which is owned by this Government? You have spent a hundred million on the lower Mississippi River and have not got one boat with an 8-foot draft of water the year round. Why? The gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. NEWTON] gave the correct answer, because the railroads have driven them off.

Why didn't you stop it? I will tell you why and we all well know. St. Louis would object to forfeiting her special low rail rates, and so would Davenport and every other river point. My good friend from the interior of Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] says he wants $2,000,000 for the upper Mississippi River. We have spent $30,000,000 for the upper Mississippi River, and we have not a boat line on it. It was driven off by the Burlington road on the one side and the Milwaukee road on the other years ago, and they will not raise their rates. Why? Because Davenport, St. Louis, St. Paul, and every city there that has privileged rates will not permit those rates to be raised. They would rather have the railway special low rates; that is the reason. Congress has spent something like $35,000,000 on the Missouri River, and there is not a boat line there. It was covered with boats before a dollar was spent. Congress has spent a hundred million dollars on the lower Mississippi, and you have not a boat line. It was covered with boats before any money was spent.

Take the Kentucky River. You have spent $4,000,000 there of Government money, as I remember it, with not a boat line on it. No commerce. Take your whole inland river waterway system. It is a failure without commerce. Why? Because the railroads have driven the boats off from the river and it will never return until the people who live along those river towns are willing to permit the railway rates to be raised so that boats can be maintained. Not until then will we get any substantial inland waterway transportation.

I am in favor of contributing to every waterway that carries transportation, every one, no matter whether it is at Duluth or in New York, or wherever it is. You can not expect that with all this sad, expensive experience, with the Mississippi once covered with boats, with not one there to-day, you can not expect anything until you squarely meet the railroad situation, and you will not be able to meet it, because St. Louis and every other river town will come here demanding special rates they now have from railways as water competing points.

That is all, it seems to me, that I can touch upon at this time.

Mr. DENISON rose.

Mr. FREAR. Gentlemen who have been railway attorneys can not afford to charge other men with insincerity on this question, because we are surely as honest as anyone else.

Mr. DENISON. Is the gentleman in favor of the $27,500,000 that is appropriated in the bill?

Mr. FREAR. I am willing to follow the Budget estimates on that. Every dollar of the $150,000,000 that we have been putting into the Mississippi has been practically wasted, and that was recommended by the Army engineers, including General Beach and these other distinguished gentlemen that I have discussed on the floor time after time. I believe the committee report of $27,000,000 ought not to be raised $15,000,000, if we are sincere in our claims for economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, the Congress formerly made separate appropriations for the improvement of each river to be improved in the United States. Some years ago the Congress adopted the policy placing the expenditures for the improvement of rivers and harbors of the whole country under the War Department, and a lump-sum appropriation has been made for several years for this purpose. The War Department determines how much money shall be expended on each of the various rivers and harbors which are subject to improvement.

The Committee on Military Affairs, having charge of this bill, recommends the sum of $27,600,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors for the next fiscal year. One-half of this will be necessary for the maintenance and upkeep of improvements already made and the other one-half for construction on approved projects. The War Department engineers asked for $63,000,000, and have stated that the least amount with which they can get along is about $43,000,000. The amendment now before us proposes to increase the amount recommended by the committee $15,000,000, making the appropriation in all for the coming fiscal year about $43,000,000.

Cumberland River, which reaches six counties of my district, is one of the new projects approved by the War Department for improvement. Unless we give the War Department this additional $15,000,000 they can do no work on any of these new approved projects, and for that reason I strongly favor this amendment and strongly urge its adoption.

IMPROVEMENT OF CUMBERLAND RIVER NECESSARY.

The Cumberland River extends into and through Monroe, Cumberland, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, and Pulaski Counties. All of these counties are in my district. They have a population purely Anglo-Saxon, and this means that they are strong, intelligent, patriotic, and loyal Americans. These six counties are very rich in mineral and timber resources, and produce large quantities of corn, other grains, stock, vegetables, tobacco, hay, and fruits. With the exception of Pulaski County, there is no railroad touching either one of these counties. These counties have no means of transportation except over the highways and the Cumberland River.

Few of the highways have been improved, and we find one of the best sections of the Nation and one of the richest valleys of the Nation bottled up without adequate means of transportation to get its products to markets or for its people to get to other sections of the country. The engineers of the War Department have advised and reported that the Cumberland River ought to be improved. They state that it would be a good investment for the Government to improve it. The Kentucky Legislature recently enacted a law authorizing the fiscal courts of each one of these counties to indemnify the United States Government against loss by reason of lands being taken in the construction of locks and dams, landing places, and the overflow by reason of these locks and dams along this river, and I feel sure that these counties will all put themselves in an attitude to meet the requirements of the Federal Government in the improvement of this river. A number of locks have been built from Nashville on down, and Lock 21 has been built up near the head of the river. There are still about 9 or 10 locks and dams to be built, and when these locks and dams are built the Cumberland River will be navigable the year around from Burnside to the mouth.

BIG RAILROADS OPPOSED TO RIVER AND HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT.

From what I have seen since I have been a Member of this House I am thoroughly convinced that the big railroad interests and lines of this country have been and are fighting against the improvement of the navigable rivers of this country. High transportation rates by the railroads, in my judgment, is the greatest drawback to prosperity in this country. These high rates have killed business. Transportation by water has always reduced railroad rates where they have been brought into competition, and just as soon as a river is improved the railroads gets busy and try to put it out of business. The improvement of the rivers of the country has had a great deal to do in keeping down railroad rates, and if the river improvement is kept up it will mean the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars to the American people. There has been complaint about the rates on the Cumberland River, but when these locks and dams are built and this becomes one of the great highways of the country, everyone will have the right to run boats on the river provided they meet the navigation rules and regulations for the protection of life and property, and when we have this competition and the river can be used throughout the year it will mean low rates on the Cumberland River. The Federal Government will have the authority to regulate these rates.

Another strong competitor in the field of transportation is the motor vehicle on the improved highways. In some sections where the highways are improved the motor vehicles are carrying nearly all of the freight and passengers except stone, coal, and other heavy commodities, and it is effecting great saving in time and money to the people. The great railroads of the country are jealous of the improvement of the highways of the country, and have begun to fight Federal aid for highways, but Federal aid for highways has become an established policy of our Government. No money appropriated from the Treasury means more to all the people than Federal aid for highways. Some people think the improvement of the rivers will affect the improvement of the highways. River improvement has nothing to do with the cutting down of highway improvement. Of course, I am not opposed to the railroads. We need the railroads. We must have the railroads, but I want to see the navigable rivers improved where it is necessary, and the public highways improved in every county of the United States with the rivers, highways, and railroads cooperating together to give to the American people the best transportation at the least possible cost. I strongly urge every Member of this House to support this amendment.

[NOTE: The $15,000,000 amendment was adopted by an overwhelming vote.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, for a good many years we have been carrying on in a regular and orderly way the improvement of rivers and harbors. This year the local engineers were directed to submit the most economical estimates they could make, moneys which could be profitably expended during the next fiscal year. Their estimate amounted to about $62,000,000. The Chief of Engineers, in an effort to reduce appropriations and expenditures, cut that down to about $42,000,000. The Director of the Budget reduced that amount to $27,000,000.

The Committee on Appropriations, having announced at the beginning of this session that it would not be their policy in any case to recommend an appropriation over that recommended by the Director of the Budget, has recommended the $27,000,000. Gentlemen have suggested in the House here that we are bound by the action of the Director of the Budget. If I were going to relieve myself of individual responsibility as to appropriations, I do not know of anyone to whom I would rather transfer that responsibility than to Charles G. Dawes, the Director of the Budget, or to my esteemed colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; but I have never supposed that the recommendation of the Budget Bureau, acting hastily without much information, was to be considered as binding on Congress. [Applause.] What does the Director of the Budget or the Budget Bureau know about appropriations in respect to rivers and harbors? They know nothing about the improvements there—not half as much as the Members of this House, who have been studying the subject of the improvement of rivers and harbors for years, before anybody connected with the Bureau of the Budget knew there was such a thing as a river or a harbor. I think we can wisely cut off many of the appropriations that we can do without. Our esteemed Committee on Appropriations has not found it desirable to follow recommendations of the Budget Bureau as to the Army items. I am glad the committee reported as they did. I admire the course of the Republican leaders in standing by the Committee on Appropriations; but, after all, I have not as yet resigned as a Member of the House, nor have I resigned my responsibilities as a Member of the House. [Applause.] There are some gentlemen who have talked here to-day as though they were mere nonentities. Granted. [Laughter.] That does not bind us all. We have our own responsibilities, and it is our duty, in my judgment, to continue the course of the Government in gradually developing this great natural resource of the country in its rivers and harbors. It is the great test as to the railroad rates. Whether there be a pound of freight carried on a particular river, the fact that that river is navigable reduces the railroad rates in competition. [Applause.] It is the greatest factor in the reduction of railroad rates that this country has ever had. I am in favor of keeping it up and accepting the amendment of the gentleman from New York. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I ask the privilege of the House of using those 16 minutes.

I rise to attempt to justify the appropriation recommended by the subcommittee that has charge of the War Department appropriation bill. The figure reported to the House is $27,635,260. I understand from the testimony given before the committee that the Budget originally recommended an appropriation of about $13,000,000. That appropriation was predicated upon the idea that as last year the Congress appropriated but $15,000,000 and the year before $13,000,000, the Bureau of the Budget would recommend about the same amount that had been appropriated the two years before. The attention of the Committee on the Budget was called to the error that they had proceeded upon in arriving at the estimate of $13,000,000, and after a conference with the chairman and other members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, with the Chief of Engineers and the Assistant Chief of Engineers, and with the representative of the Budget Bureau of the War Department, the amount was agreed upon by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of this House without any representation in that conference from the Committee on Appropriations, at $27,635,260, which your subcommittee approved and reported to this House.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors comes in here now and proposes to increase that to $42,815,661, $250,000 more than what the district engineers ask for—and I ask special attention of those Members on the floor who claim the subcommittee has not given sufficient attention to this proposal, and that only one committee, the legislative committee, has—that they have increased the amount $250,000 more than the Chief of Engineers recommended, for in the total amount of $42,815,661 is included an item of $250,000 for surveys which the committee includes in the item following in the bill. So that the amount, if you are going to grant all that the Chief of Engineers asked for, should certainly be reduced to the extent of $250,000.

Again, there has been reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a bill for new projects aggregating in the total amount $31,000,000 and which is now on the calendar. There is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to take away jurisdiction from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but in that report, which is going to be acted upon—and, bear in mind, gentlemen, that this amount you are appropriating here will not be available for any new projects—there is going to be expended on new projects expected to be authorized at this present session a total authorization of more than $31,000,000. There is included in that bill an authorization for six seagoing barges, aggregating $4,500,000. In the estimate of $42,815,661 which you are asked to vote now there is included an item for these same barges, only not six but four, of $3,000,000. We are providing an authorization in the river and harbor bill for $4,500,000 for six seagoing barges and in that estimate of $42,815,000 there is included an item of some $3,000,000 for four barges, so that the $42,000,000, instead of being reduced only $250,000, should be further reduced by $3,000,000, or making the total available for river and harbor projects $39,565,661. Now, what is the testimony before the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors? I have in my hand here the respective testimony before both committees. The testimony on these estimates that are now before you for consideration before the Rivers and Harbors Committee comprised 54 pages of closely printed type, or 100 pages. The testimony on these same identical projects before the Committee on Appropriations in larger type comprise 200 pages, and there is much testimony before the Appropriations Committee that is not found at all in the hearings before the Rivers and Harbors Committee. Here we find $39,565,000 is the total amount that can be used by the Chief of Engineers, exclusive of the survey item of $250,000, which is otherwise appropriated for, and $3,000,000 for dredges, which are specifically authorized in another bill.

Now, let us get down to the condition of the existing moneys available for this work. All river and harbor appropriations are available until expended, and this item we are appropriating here continues that policy of making the amount available until expended. On December 1, 1921, there were $28,224,000 unexpended; $9,774,000 of that was under contract, leaving $18,500,000 unobligated.

On March 1, this year, as General Taylor, Assistant Chief of Engineers, told me on Saturday last, after a lapse of three months, there were $15,584,000 available, and that there will be $10,000,000 available at the end of this fiscal year. Now, if there are $15,000,000 available and we appropriate $27,635,000, and this talk about two and a half millions every month is confounded by the facts, because if he had $18,000,000 available and unobligated on December 1 and now has $15,000,000 on March 1, there have only been $3,000,000 used in the three months, or an average of about $1,000,000 a month, so he will have available at the end of this year $37,000,000. Now, what has been the average expenditure during the past 10 years? I have them listed, taken from the testimony. The total for the last 10 years, gross amount, is $310,271,000, or an average of $31,000,000 a year. The Chief of Engineers or the assistant chief went into a detail exposition of these various items.

There has been so much loose talk presented here in debate that it is hard to answer all of it. Gentlemen from the interior of the country say that there is no appropriation intended to improve interior rivers. But let me call to your attention this: Of the $39,565,000 that is proposed for river and harbor improvements, for the Ohio River, $5,000,000; for the Mississippi, the upper and lower above St. Louis $2,000,000, below $1,000,000, making $3,000,000; Allegheny, $900,000, making a total of $8,900,000. Now, it is estimated that there will be expended, as in the past, about $11,000,000 for maintenance. They have available at the end of the year $10,000,000 and we are appropriating $27,000,000, and there will be all told $37,000,000, or $6,000,000 more than the average expended in 10 years past, and it is within $2,000,000 of the total amount that the Chief of Engineers asked should be expended, and in that amount there are included items which are not pressing in character. For instance, there is an appropriation for continuing——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just one minute.

Mr. DEMPSEY. A very brief one.

Mr. STAFFORD. For continuing the improvement of the Delaware River and Chesapeake Canal, that relic that Congress purchased for some two million and odd dollars connecting the Delaware River with the Chesapeake, and it is now estimated it will require $13,000,000 to put it in condition. That is a project that can well be postponed. No additional traffic will develop, because, instead of having a lock type, two locks, they are proceeding on the plan of having an even-water canal.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does the gentleman know that his own home city of Milwaukee expects to spend from municipal funds $10,000,000 for the improvement of its harbor, and that other municipalities throughout the country are spending similar amounts, hundreds of millions of dollars, where the Government is spending none?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not embarrass me by quoting Milwaukee. Why, the gentleman speaks about an appropriation for that city and wishes to divert my attention from the real proposition before the House. There is included in a bill on the calendar an appropriation for new projects in which the city of Milwaukee will cooperate to the extent of millions of dollars, in which an authorization is made for $4,000,000 for a project at my home city, but not one cent of this money will be available for that project, and the gentleman from New York, if he knows anything, knows that not a cent of this money will be available for the project. The estimate for this year's work at Milwaukee is but $64,000, and that is for maintenance. That is one of my arguments for the House not going beyond the amount reported by this committee, for the reason that if this bill for new projects is adopted into law it will call for additional appropriations of eight or ten millions of dollars. This money is to be used exclusively in those projects that have been heretofore authorized, and you may expect, gentlemen, if that bill passes, as it is the intention to pass it, authorizing these new projects, including new projects as a general policy, that are more worthy than many that have heretofore been authorized, you will be called on not only to appropriate this $27,000,000 but $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 more. In regard to the Milwaukee project, with which I am familiar, although $4,000,000 is to be authorized to be expended, nevertheless there will be needed next year only something like two or three hundred thousand dollars. That is a matter on which there has been no testimony, not even before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, as to how much is necessary at the present time to carry on the work on these new projects.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the gentleman to say if this amendment passes the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] will present an additional amendment such as the bill reported in by his committee in March, 1920?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would not be in order. It has never been heard of to vote money for projects not heretofore authorized. I am in hearty sympathy in providing in another bill for the new projects that have been recommended, but it is not in order.

Mr. KING. If it was in order, does not the law as to the Mississippi River prevent dredging of any harbors?

Mr. STAFFORD. You would conclude from some of the speeches made that we are placing a provision in this bill forbidding navigation on the Mississippi River, but the testimony is uncontroverted that what is needed to increase traffic are barges. They have the required depth of water. What is necessary is to have barges with which to carry the freight.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] should be more careful in his statements, occupying the position of chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, than to indulge in loose talk by saying that Milwaukee would be able to spend the local funds appropriated by the municipality in cooperation with the National Government if this appropriation is increased. Such is not the fact, and he is likewise about ninety millions away from the mark when he says municipalities are spending hundreds of millions of dollars where the Government is spending none. If you will scan these estimates you will see that the committee, with the available money that is on hand, in recommending $27,635,260 has done full justice to every existing project.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—yeas 158, noes 54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sacramento River, Calif., $400,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The vote just taken shows the dangerous effect of appropriating for rivers and harbors by lump sums. Every Member of this House who has a project—old, new, or in contemplation; good, bad, or indifferent—thinks he must vote for increasing the amount, because he will have his share. Wait until you see the apportionment made by the Engineer Corps. I do not find fault with their wisdom. I have often praised them, and I always defend them. The proper prerogative of this body is to take up a river and harbor bill item by item, and we will not return to an orderly or salutary method of procedure until we do that. When the bill is before us, let us consider the different methods of transportation—by rail, by water, by deep-water navigation, by shallow-water navigation, and by automobile truck. We are sure to make a mistake until we return to the former method, considering present-day conditions, first passing upon a general policy and next upon these specific projects.

It has been stated that I was chairman of the committee when some $170,000,000 was appropriated for rivers. Maybe that is so. A considerable share of that was for the Mississippi River, which everybody believes in keeping open, because it is the great river of the country. A good share of it was for the Delaware or other similar streams on which are great ports like Philadelphia, which have deep-water connection with the sea, and I do not disagree with a reasonable amount of appropriation for shallow streams, but, as a general fact, they are obsolete in the general transportation system of this country. The principal objection lies against those streams which are improved by locks and dams. It used to be an argument here that when there was a railroad costing ten millions paralleling a river, that we ought to spend millions for improving that river, though never intended for navigation, just to make the railroad fix proper rates and behave itself. In earlier days the shallow rivers had their proper sphere, floating logs, with other kinds of navigation, but with the development of the railway and other transportation methods, as, for example, motor trucks, and so forth, those methods have been superseded.

I was interested in the argument of my good friend from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] in his remarks favoring the improvement of the upper Mississippi River.

I have been over that stretch of the river many times. I do not think anyone can maintain that in such recommendations as I made I was not generous to that upper stretch of the river. I hoped for results, but let me say to this committee that that is an impossible proposition as a method of transportation. In the first place, what you ship from Iowa is largely in the form of hogs. But suppose you consider the shipment of grain. Except on the banks of the river you can never utilize that river as a means of shipping out your grain. When you come from the interior you are within 130 or 150 or 180 miles of Chicago, and do you think a shipper is going to unload his freight car, put his grain on these boats, more or less leaky, insure his grain, and ship it on to New Orleans when he can send it so easily in the same car to Chicago? To consider that proposition is to show that it borders on absurdity.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that the States that are not bordering on the river and communities not bordering on the river will be benefited practically as much as the river cities by river transportation? For instance, Kansas and Nebraska, since we have enacted legislation securing joint traffic rates between rail and river transportation, are now getting the benefit of water transportation just as the river cities do?

Mr. BURTON. I can not answer that question in the brief time allotted to me.

Mr. DENISON. The facts show it.

Mr. BURTON. No; they do not. They must pay higher rates in the interior because of the cheaper rates on lines competing with waterways.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would it not be possible to develop water transportation on the Mississippi in very much the same way as it has been developed on the Rhine?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. I have heard that argument of my good friend from Minnesota many times. I have been on the Rhine many times. I have been on it when it was so crowded that a passenger boat could scarcely navigate. It is the greatest inland waterway in the world.

Now, what is the difference between the Rhine and the Mississippi? In the first place, the height of the water the year round is practically uniform on the Rhine. You do not have the difficulty that you have on the Ohio and the Mississippi in the oscillation, causing a difference in levels and varying at times in some places as much as 70 feet. You can not locate your warehouse on the Ohio and on the Mississippi as you can on the Rhine. In the next place, the Rhine is fed by the melting of snow and ice in the Alps. In summer seasons when other waterways are lowered by drought the waters of the Rhine are blue, like those of the ocean, from the melting of the snow. In the next place, the railways running on both banks, in comparison with ours, are like pony railroads, with small cars, not carrying large quantities of freight. In the next place, grain is needed and articles of manufacture and raw materials all along the Rhine, which is the great workshop of Germany. Four-fifths and more of the heavy traffic handled in Germany is right near the banks of the Rhine.

Now, you have the Mississippi River oscillating in depth and size, sometimes flooded, with no wharves; on its banks railroads highly equipped, able to carry the freight. I noticed at one time an estimate that showed with great solemnity that you could ship freight from St. Paul by boat at 60 per cent of the railroad rate. But the statistics did not show that any freight was shipped. Why not? Because the railroad was so much quicker, and so much more convenient, and so much more secure for the traffic that was sent; so even with that differential of nearly 40 per cent, it did not cause traffic to go on the river.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Should we not also consider the disposition, habits, and customs of the country? Do they not have much to do with it?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. I mentioned that this morning. People are in the habit of shipping their freight by rail. In Memphis in time of deep water there was not a single bale of cotton shipped by the river. In case of rail transportation the bills of lading can be taken and negotiated at the bank, whereas if you ship by river you would have to consider the uncertain chances of the time it would reach seaboard, and you would have to insure your cargo and assume all the uncertainties of a river voyage.

I do not mean to say that I am entirely opposed to inland waterways. I trust I may file with my remarks a classification of some that are useful. I may say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I favored locks between Minneapolis and St. Paul years ago, and thought at that time it would be of great benefit to both cities; but I do not know how many tons of freight go through those locks. Can the gentleman tell me?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not looked into that.

Mr. BURTON. I am afraid if you did you would find the results very disappointing.

Mr. KNUTSON. When the gentleman speaks of the difference in the water levels on the Mississippi River and on the Rhine, could not the height of water be made uniform by a system of reservoirs?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, there you would find that the ground you would have to utilize for your reservoirs would be a good share of the State of Minnesota, and before you got through with it you would find it a very impracticable and unprofitable scheme.

Mr. DENISON. Applying the principles that the gentleman has just practically stated, I am interested to know whether the gentleman from Ohio is in favor of or opposed to the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes proposition?

Mr. BURTON. That is a different proposition. That is deep-water navigation.

Mr. DENISON. By process of canals, and all that?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. So I think the gentleman is in favor of that.

Mr. BURTON. If it proves practicable, as I am very sure it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that a statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] just now ought to go unnoticed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] said he was opposed to a lump-sum appropriation for rivers and harbors, like that carried in this bill, because it had a tendency to induce all the Members of the House who desired bad improvements made, or improvements of doubtful value, to join a combination in a raid on the Treasury; the inference to any person reading the statement being that under this provision of the lump-sum appropriation the engineers distribute the money where Members of Congress ask for it without any authorization by Congress for the improvement. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Ohio knows—I was going to say he ought to know, but he knows—that not a dollar of this money can be expended except for an improvement which has been heretofore specifically authorized by Congress in bills that did not make lump-sum appropriations but in bills specially identifying the projects; and the larger share of those projects, I believe, were authorized when the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] was either the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House or a member of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate which authorized the projects.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will yield to the gentleman for anything.

Mr. BURTON. I think I must correct the gentleman on that. There were a number of projects that were put off the map in the time when I was chairman that I regret to say have since been brought into the list. Now I want to ask the gentleman a question. Does not the gentleman from Illinois realize that among the projects recommended and which have been adopted by the Congress there are those of very unequal merit?

Mr. MANN. That was particularly true while my distinguished friend was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. I must differ with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Yes; of course, the gentleman does not agree to that. He is interested, while I am a disinterested observer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. I think the gentleman from Illinois will recall that whenever I brought in a bill he voted for it and gave his cordial approval to it. He was particularly interested in the Calumet River and some other projects.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Calumet River was taken care of before the gentleman from Ohio was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, no; the gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not. It was in my first term in Congress. That was the first thing I did when I came here. I accomplished it in my first term.

Mr. BURTON. I was chairman of the committee, I think, before the gentleman from Illinois ever came to this Congress. When did he come to this Congress?

Mr. MANN. Long before the gentleman from Ohio was chairman of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. I think the gentleman is wrong on his dates.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not. I was elected in 1896. Was the gentleman chairman of that committee then?

Mr. BURTON. I was then a member of the committee and later chairman of it—in 1898.

Mr. MANN. He was not then chairman. Of course, that has nothing to do with the question, and I do not care to be diverted from the point I am making. The gentleman tried to give the inference to the country that there was a combination of rascals in the House seeking to put over bad projects in a lump-sum appropriation when the fact is that no money can be expended on any project under this bill without having first been specifically authorized in a bill of the kind which he prefers, setting out item by item the authorized projects; and I think the country ought to know that. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I try to be philosophical, though it is a little difficult at times, and this is one of the times, since the vote increasing the river and harbor appropriation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just reminded us that no matter how much the lump-sum appropriation was increased the moneys could not be utilized except on approved projects. May I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], a member of the subcommittee, how many approved projects there are?

Mr. STAFFORD. There are 500, only 200 of which are considered by the Chief of Engineers as worthy of work at the present time.

Mr. MONDELL. There are 500 projects, and if you raise the appropriation high enough one may have some hope to have some money spent on almost any one of them, including the 200 or 300 that do not even meet the commendation of the Chief of Engineers, including those they have condemned as utterly unworthy. If the appropriation be raised high enough—I would not want to say that any man voted here on that theory—if the appropriation is made high enough, and the Chief of Engineers is sufficiently urged, the hope brightens and may burgeon into fruition that even the most unworthy of the projects may have a slight amount allotted to it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not talking about irrigation projects, is he? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. No irrigation project built in the United States up to this time has ever taken money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United States. The money that is used for irrigation projects comes from the sale of public lands and their resources, and no penny of it has ever come out of the pocket of a taxpayer. And nevertheless and notwithstanding, I am, of course, favorable to work of that character to be paid for out of the funds provided for that purpose, and I am also for river and harbor appropriations and always have been, and always have voted for river and harbor bills, I think, with one exception.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he is not in favor of appropriating, out of the Federal Treasury, supplemental funds with reference to irrigation?

Mr. MONDELL. There was an appropriation made under a bill I introduced as a loan to the reclamation fund, which is being repaid.

Mr. GARNER. I understand; but does the gentleman take the position that he is opposed to making a direct appropriation for the purpose of supplementing this fund in the form of a loan of, say, $100,000,000 or $200,000,000?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not advocated that at this time.

Mr. GARNER. I am asking the gentleman if he is opposed to it. That is the main thing, because the Republican platform advocates it.

Mr. MONDELL. I will discuss that matter when we reach it. I am in favor of reclamation and of river and harbor work. The fact is that there are 500 river and harbor projects in the United States on which the funds voted here might be used, and there are naturally a great many congressional districts where those funds might be used. It has been suggested to me by a gentleman that the vote that has just been taken, overturning the Budget, reversing our practice and policy of economy, is really voicing a protest against high freight rates. If that is what it was, it seems to me that the gentlemen have not very carefully figured out the effect of river improvements on freight rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. As I have frequently said, I believe in river improvement. I also believe in low railway rates. We must have low rates if we are to have prosperity. The American people will not use the inland streams as the European people do, because they are too impatient, too anxious to receive cash for their products; when it is delivered to the railroad they are too impatient to have done with the transaction and avoid all the delays and vexations frequently encountered in the use of the waterways. But if we keep improving the waterways we may eventually accustom the people to that kind of transportation, and I hope we may.

In the matter of freight rates, what is the effect? Still insisting that I am favorable to the improvement of rivers and waterways in the hope that our people may become accustomed to use them, what happens is this: When there is an improvement of one of our large rivers making water transportation possible, every community along the river insists that the railway transportation rates be made as cheap as the water rates, and such a rate is frequently granted to a point below the actual cost of carrying the goods, and the surrounding country pays the difference. That is what has occurred whenever we cheapen our water transportation so that it invades and curtails and shortens the business of the railroads. Until we stop doing that we shall get very little benefit out of our appropriations for river improvement. The country that I represent, the country that most of you gentlemen represent, is not only helping to pay for the improvement but helping to pay for the loss on the transportation along the river banks. [Applause.]

Some of the gentlemen from the territory where the rates are so high as to leave no margin of profit to the producer should not be carried away with the idea that in making these improvements they are securing lower rates. If the effect continues to be as in the past, it increases the rate at every interior point. That ought to be cured in the matter of transportation. I believe we should go on in the meantime in a reasonable way with river improvements. The mistake that the House has made today, as I see it, is the mistake of being carried away by local influences in voting for appropriations above those that are justified, and it will be difficult for those who voted for the increase to find an excuse when asked by their people what they did in the upholding and maintaining of economy and the principle of the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, are we going to have any more post-mortems on this last amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to bring the post-mortems to a close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why not close it now?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] made a statement which seems to me almost incredible, and especially so coming from the gentleman from Ohio. His statement was in effect that river transportation will only benefit in the main those communities which are on the river. Now, no doubt the gentleman from Ohio has in mind conditions that existed in former years when there was no law compelling the railroads to make joint freight rates and joint traffic arrangements, but in the transportation act of 1920, after the most careful consideration, Congress enacted a provision giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to compel the railroads to grant joint rail and water rates and joint traffic arrangements. Not only that, but the commission was given power to compel the railroads to help build joint terminal facilities for the transfer of freight from the railroads to the boats and vice versa, so that shippers can make through shipments from one system of transportation to the other. The result is that if the time shall only come when the Interstate Commerce Commission shall grant a fair rate division between the boats and the railroads, the whole central western part of the United States will benefit by the transportation on the Mississippi River, and the same is true of other rivers.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURTON. Does not the gentleman know that there has been a revolution in all traffic, that now haulage relatively is much less expensive than formerly, and that the terminal charges, loading and unloading, cost very much more, and that it is only in very exceptional cases that it is worth while in a through rate to unload freight from a boat upon the wharf and then load again? And then another question: Has anything been done under the act of 1920?

Mr. DENISON. In answer to that question I will point out wherein the gentleman from Ohio has fallen into error. He is still possessed of certain ideas and theories which he had many years ago and which the changed conditions do not justify. Splendid terminals have been built at St. Louis, East St. Louis, Cairo, Memphis, and other cities, and thousands of tons of freight have been coming from Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Indiana, and other States to those cities for transfer to the barge line in order to take advantage of the low freight rate down the Mississippi River. Joint rates are now made. Through shipments are being made by rail and river to every part of the world. The barge line can not accommodate all the freight that is offered. It is being offered faster than we can furnish boats to carry it. That is the answer to the question.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman tell how many tons have been transferred in that way?

Mr. DENISON. Much more than there are boats to carry them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, the people of the Middle West, and indeed the entire country, are interested in everything pertaining to the improvement of the Mississippi River, and are therefore particularly concerned in any project looking toward the betterment of the harbor at Quincy, Ill., and that arm of the river known as Quincy Bay.

With the coming revival of commerce on the great "Father of Waters," the importance of Quincy, its harbor and bay, to the great benefit of navigation and trade upon the entire Mississippi River and its tributaries can not be overestimated.

Therefore it is with great pleasure that I urge upon the Congress the early reviving and resumption of one of the oldest and most utilitarian projects proposed and designed to aid the prosperity of the Mississippi Valley and its wide adjacencies.

From Galena to Cairo the great river bends like a silver bow about the western side of Illinois, rounding a distance of some 400 miles. At the middle of this great bow and recognizable for miles rises from her beautiful bluffs, 160 feet high, the industrious city of Quincy with its 40,000 inhabitants, ample and high-grade labor, alert and honest men of business and professional life, factories the products of which render her the largest manufacturing and freight tonnage producer between Chicago and Kansas City and St. Louis and St. Paul, excellent climate, first-class schools, colleges, churches, and hospitals, and an extensive and celebrated park system; 42 per cent of the heads of families owning their own homes; surrounded by a rich country in which dwell 210,000 urban inhabitants; within a radius of 75 miles a total population of nearly a million; miles of concrete roads radiating from the city and reaching these fertile fields; all of which fully equips the city of Quincy to rapidly become, when the great river wakes from its lethargy, as it is about to do, with a magnificent harbor and bay at her feet, the greatest center of inland-waterway commerce in the Middle West.

On the 1st day of June, 1878, in the rivers and harbors act, Congress directed the Secretary of War, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, and estimates of costs of improvements to be made at "the harbor at Quincy, Ill." (See vol. 20, U. S. Stat. L., 45th Cong., pp. 160–161.)

Later, on January 13, 1879, F. U. Farquhar, major of Engineers, reported under the authority of the above act to Brig. Gen. A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, the result of his survey, accompanied by tracings, pursuant to a letter of instructions to him from General Humphreys, dated July 8, 1878. (See vol. 4, Ex. Docs., 2d sess., 46th Cong., 1879–80, p. 1130; also printed as a part of S. Ex. Doc. No. 53. See vol. 4, S. Docs., 45th Cong., 3d sess., p. 2, from which the following excerpt of facts appear:)

Quincy Harbor consists of the Mississippi River in front of the city of Quincy, Ill., and Quincy Bay, which is the lower end of a slough formed by part of an old bed of the Mississippi.

After recommending plans for deepening the water of the harbor at an expense of some $26,236.25, the report describes Quincy Bay in 1879 as a part of said river bed, extending along the foot of the high bluff above Quincy for about 3½ miles, Bear Creek emptying into the upper end—also having a connection by a slough with the Mississippi River above—with a width of from 200 to 700 feet, a depth of water at lowest stage of from 2 to more than 20 feet, and 4,000 feet above its mouth crossed by a railroad bridge with pivot draw, two openings of 80 feet in the clear.

In years gone by—

Before the lower end of the bay filled up—

it was used as a winter harbor for steamboats, but areas of water over 4½ feet deep at lowest stage—in winter—were so small that the harbor is not now used at all. A dredging proposition was advanced and recommended according to tracings dividing the area into sections A, B, and C to a depth of 6 feet at low water, with a width of 400 feet; sections D and E to same depth and a width of 600 feet; and areas F, G, and H to reach the deep water above.

This dredging when finished will make a harbor of 90 acres—680,000 cubic yards of dredging at 25 cents per cubic yard to cost $170,000. Dredging to be done gradually, first through the whole length 100 feet in width, and afterwards widening it to the widths specified.

The bank of the island near the mouth of the bay was to be protected by riprap both on bay and river side and at other points at a cost of $27,500.

Recapitulation.

Spur dams on Mississippi River	$26,236.25
Dredging in bay	170,000.00
Shore protection of riprap	7,500.00
	203,736.25
Add 10 per cent for contingencies	20,373.62
	224,109.87

Much needed as a winter harbor for vessels and will increase commerce and manufactures of Quincy.

Twenty thousand dollars was appropriated for the project in the rivers and harbors act approved March 3, 1879 (see vol. 20, Rev. Stat., 45th Cong., 3d sess., p. 372), and this was followed by other appropriations up to 1896. Since that time allotments have been made from the general appropriation to keep up a "sufficiently" large and deep area in the lower bay for use as a winter harbor. (Report G. M. Hoffman, major, Corps of Engineers, Apr. 20, 1915.)

The original project of dredging was never completed to a depth of more than 4½ feet instead of 6 feet. (See Report Chief of Engineers, 1883, p. 1425. Map.)

In 1885 Congress provided for the examination of the mouth of Whipple Creek (see Report Chief of Engineers for 1885, p. 1717, vol. 27, House Ex. Doc. No. 84, 48th Cong., 2d sess.) with a view of the "removal of the bar and obstructions at and near the mouth of Whipple Creek," which resulted in a report by Maj. A. Mackenzie, holding that "Quincy Bay is undoubtedly worthy of improvement," but that removing such bar and obstructions is of local rather than general importance and that the project of 1878 will furnish a sufficient winter harbor.

Eighty-one thousand cubic yards were excavated on Whipple Creek Bar to deepen the passage to the upper bay in 1885, under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission. In 1891 Major Ruffner recommended a retaining levee or bulkhead to keep said creek from continually pouring its débris into the narrows and choking up the passage.

The rivers and harbors act of July 13, 1892, authorized and appropriated funds with which the bulkhead was built in 1893, when 18,000 cubic yards were dredged from the narrows outside the bulkhead, which prevented for a number of years the filling of the passage at every rainstorm and until the space inclosed had been completely filled and the bulkhead itself broken in several places. In 1895–1899 further repairs of the bulkhead were made, additional dredging in the upper bay passage being done.

The rivers and harbors act of June 13, 1902, provided for an examination and survey of Quincy Harbor and Bay, and a report—December 9, 1902—thereon by Capt. C. McDonald, Corps of Engineers (see H. Doc. No. 112, 58th Cong., 2d sess.), showed that of the authorized expenditure of $170,000 by the 1878 project $130,000 had been spent; that seven surveys of the bay had been made, the last in 1895; that the accretions in Quincy Bay have reduced the area available as an ice harbor from about 90 acres to about 37 acres, namely, to the space inclosed by the harbor lines between the two railroad bridges; that there is a gradual shelving of the entire area to be apprehended; recommends that area opposite Broadway sewer be dredged to a depth of 6 feet at low water—balance available should be reserved for dredging the bay.

Major Hoffman regards this report as a virtual abandonment of the upper bay and the narrows, yet it seems to me that the original project authorized in 1878 still stands intact. Additional dredging was done in the lower bay in 1910, 1911, and 1913. The Indian Grave levee district, organized in 1879, in 1881 built a levee across the head of the bay. Prior to its construction Bear Creek made a current in Quincy Bay even at medium stages and had a good effect. (See Hoffman report above referred to.) Maj. C. S. Riche reports, 1908–9, the abandonment of the upper bay by the district office some years ago. In 1910 Maj. C. Keeler, district office, June 10, 1910, joins said abandonment. Maj. M. G. Hoffman, November 15, 1913, in a résumé, abandons the upper bay. He says:

The attempt to maintain a suitable depth in the upper bay was abandoned many years ago, for the reason of the great cost of maintenance, lack of commercial value, and the belief that the lower bay is sufficiently commodious for present purposes.

He adds, and his report is the latest available—

It has always been intended to keep the lower bay redredged and in suitable condition to be used as a winter harbor.

Willow Slough connects the bay with the Mississippi, and the rivers and harbors act of September, 1890, provided for an examination as to the advisability of reopening the slough, or some other channel from the river to the bay. Major Ruffner, making the report under this authority (House Ex. Doc. No. 284, 51st Cong., 2d sess.), said the slough is low and flat, 2¾ miles long when the gauge reads about 5 feet above low-water mark. Its mouth is about 1,000 feet above the harbor-line limits as recently established. Ruffner reported against the advisability of the proposal, as did a board of engineers reporting February 18, 1891.

Again, in the rivers and harbors act of March 3, 1899, another examination was authorized, this time "with a view to preventing the filling up of Quincy Bay by sediment carried by the river in times of high water." Under this authority Captain Townsend reported (House Doc. No. 38, 56th Cong., 1st sess.) April 4, 1899, that the river here carried but little matter in suspension and that the amount dropped into the bay thereby "is hardly appreciable." Townsend reports against the proposal. Major Hoffman in his report said that to open and maintain the slough to prevent such small deposits as it may bring into the bay it would be necessary to construct and maintain a 12-foot levee along the bay shore a distance of 1½ miles.

Major Hoffman, in his final report on Quincy Bay and Willow Slough, concurs with Ruffner and Townsend and recommends that no further dredging or otherwise be made in the bay above the old bridge at the Narrows or at Willow Slough, the bay between the bridges to be maintained as heretofore. Concurred in April 20, 1915, C. McD. Townsend, colonel, Corps of Engineers. Reviewed and affirmed by Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors June 15, 1915.

Mr. Chairman, in the judgment of a layman, based upon all the foregoing data and a personal examination, it seems to be patent that what the upper bay needs most of all is dredging and water.

The supply of water has been diminished no doubt through the years by reason of a number of causes, principally, however, by the closing of Bear Creek by the Indian Grave levee and the filling up by débris and willows in Willow Slough. The expenditure of a single cent in making a reexamination with a view of keeping river sediment from passing through the slough into the bay is ridiculous. It was a waste of money to do so, and the suggestion, based on such foolishness, that a 12-foot levee 1½ miles in length would be necessary was nothing more than a fanciful remedy for a fanciful disease.

Mr. Chairman, a project should be authorized by this Congress to complete the original plan of 1878 to dredge the 90 acres provided for in that project. In addition the débris at Cedar Creek should be removed, thus widening the narrows. The practical thing to do—and this is likewise the opinion of Mr. Enoch R. Chatten, C. E.—is to provide at an early date for the authorization by this Congress of an examination and survey with a view to keeping upper Quincy Bay open by cutting a channel from the river to the bay above the narrows, beginning on the west shore of Quincy Bay about three-fourths of a mile above Quincy Bay bridge at the mouth of Willow Slough, thence one-fourth mile up Willow Slough, thence north and west to the river.

Mr. Chairman, the improvement of Quincy Harbor is not a local affair but of supreme importance to the entire river and valley. It is an invaluable arm of the mighty river which is soon to fulfill its destiny in the development of the Middle West and in solving the transportation for the entire country.

Formidable opposition to its development during the past few years has ceased. It has and is so far as able doing its duty in furnishing covert for boats the entire length of the river. The Federal Government recognizes and uses the bay for its fleets of barges and boats in the winter and to repair its craft when required. "It did its bit" during the late war by having built upon its shores and launched upon its bosom fleets of barges for the use of the Government.

The rapidly increasing navigation on the Mississippi renders it imperative that Quincy Bay be restored to its original prestige and where its usefulness may be revived against the oncoming return of the thrifty packets and palatial steamers of the days of the Natchez and the Robert E. Lee.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES, INLAND AND COASTWISE WATERWAYS.

For additional expense incurred in the operation of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways acquired by the United States in pursuance of the fourth paragraph of section 6 of the Federal control act of March 21, 1918, and operated in pursuance of section 201 of the transportation act approved February 28, 1920, $30,000: Provided, That this appropriation may be used for the payment of experts, clerks, and other employees in the War Department in accordance with the provisions of section 201 (e) of the transportation act, 1920, approved February 28, 1920, but no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation in excess of $3,000 per annum, except one at $4,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In general debate this item relating to the management of certain barge lines was referred to and some statements were made concerning the barge line on the Warrior River in a case pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The inference was given that perhaps the attorney for the Government had been derelict, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission itself was subject to some criticism. I have a letter here from Mr. Luther M. Walter, who happens to be a particular friend of mine, a lawyer of very high standing, who happens to be the Government attorney in this case, which letter explains the matter, stating that there can be no possible reflection upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, March 22, 1922.

HON. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANN: My attention has just been called to the proceedings on the floor of the House as reported on pages 3869 and 3870 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for March 14, 1922, relevant to a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission in which the War Department is complainant. I desire particularly to call your attention to the statement on page 3870, made by Mr. Anthony:

"Civilian attorneys who had been employed were evidently more interested in prolonging the litigation than in bringing it to a showdown."

Inasmuch as I happen to be the "civilian attorney" who had been employed by the War Department to handle this case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, I desire to briefly let you know just what the facts are. You very fully expressed the view which I entertain as to the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That body is not subject to censure for not acting on a case that is not brought to an issue by the attorneys in the case.

The Federal manager of the barge line filed a complaint before the commission in the fall of 1920. Later I was employed as special counsel to conduct the litigation. I reached the conclusion that the complaints (there were two of them) were defective and required amendment. Amended complaints were filed January 8, 1921. During the previous month the barge line management had endeavored to secure an adjustment of the complaint without the necessity for further action before the commission, and those negotiations continued through at least a part of January, 1921.

The cases were set for hearing at New Orleans before an examiner of the commission on January 31, 1921. The carriers, and, as I am informed, the Federal manager of the barge line, sought a postponement. The first notice I had of the postponement was in the form of a telegram received while on the train en route to New Orleans for the purpose of trying the case. The case was again set for hearing at New Orleans on March 21, 1921. The complainant's case was completed on the second day of the hearing. The defendants represented to the examiner that they were not prepared to meet the case presented and asked for a postponement, which was granted to a date later to be fixed. Thereafter the commission assigned the case for hearing at Washington on May 25, 1921. Counsel for the defendants and the complainant requested that the hearing at Washington be canceled and the case assigned for hearing at Chicago on May 21, four days earlier. The commission canceled the hearing for May 25, later setting the case for hearing at Chicago on June 20. This latter hearing was had and the taking of testimony was finally concluded on July 1, 1921.

September 15, 1921, was fixed as the date for filing briefs. The defendants obtained an extension until October 1; I requested a further extension of 10 days for filing my brief, which was granted. The case was thereupon submitted to the examiner, who served his tentative report February 6, 1922. Exceptions thereto were due February 26, 1922; by request of the defendants this date was extended to March 15, and again at their request until March 25.

You can thus see that of the various requests for delay I made only one, and that only for a period of 10 days. The record in the case extends over several thousand pages of testimony and several hundred exhibits, including a large amount of statistical data.

The case has not yet been submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It can not be charged in the slightest with any of the delay that has ensued. I have no doubt that the commission will, after it hears oral argument on the exceptions, reach a decision which will be fair to the Government's barge line and give it, out of the joint revenue, a portion consistent with the service which it performs.

I have no sympathy with the criticism of the Interstate Commerce Commission voiced on the floor of the House. I have always regarded the commission as a capable and impartial tribunal entitled to that high respect which we accord to courts under similar circumstances. At no time has the commission been in position to express an opinion upon the case. The tentative report of the examiner is simply the recommendation of an employee of the commission, and for which the commission is in nowise responsible.

This letter is already too long, but I hope, if you have the opportunity privately, that you will set Mr. ANTHONY straight. I have no desire to precipitate any debate or colloquy with Mr. ANTHONY over what he saw fit to express on the floor of the House, but I would like to have him know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not to blame because the case has not been already decided. While I resent the suggestion in his statement that as "civilian attorney" for the War Department I was interested in prolonging the disposition of the case, that is of no importance compared with the good name of the commission.

With best wishes to you personally, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LUTHER M. WALTER.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 115, line 19, strike out the word "control."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we might as well strike out the word "control" because the control here seems to have vanished. On the last vote we had in this committee, changing the budgetary plan to the extent of $15,000,000, the control failed by a vote of 158 to 54, and if you properly simmer down all of the arguments that we have had upon the floor since that vote was taken they could properly be designated as the lamentations of the majority over the loss of control. If you want to get the control back, if you want to hold it on the question of economy and of budgetary estimates, we must adopt the broad-gauge policy of economy which is not changeable every time an item affects a particular district.

I can explain why the leader could not control the votes on the $15,000,000 proposition. When this Budget idea was first under consideration and the leader of the House went before the distinguished subcommittee, headed by Mr. WOOD of Indiana and by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], he told them that they must cut down to the budgetary estimates; that they must hew to the line; that they must even get their snickersnee and cut. They carried out his commands, his admonition, the Democrats and Republicans alike, and following the suggestion made by the land commissioner of this Nation they cut out of the bill 13 surveyors general. That meant cutting out an expense that ran up to a half a million dollars; it meant a saving to this Government of a half million dollars, and it was in line with the Budget's recommendation and a recommendation of one of the bureau chiefs of the Nation. But it so happens that among those 13 surveyors general one was stationed in the State of Wyoming. When that was disclosed the very leader who got the cut to be made in the committee could not stand it, because it affected his own State; it was taking something from Wyoming that it could not afford to lose. The matter came back on the floor of this House and through the gentleman's leadership he put those 13 surveyors general and that half million dollars of expense back into the bill, right in face of the action of the committee in cutting it out and trying to save it in accordance with the pledges made to the people of this country. What can you expect when you have such leadership as that—a leadership which when there is involved a surveyor general to be taken out of the State of Wyoming can no longer lead? The saving has to come from some other State, it must be a matter that affects some one else. It is selfish leadership of that kind that has lost the control of votes in this House, and when you have a $15,000,000 proposition like that one just settled it loses under such leadership by a vote of 158 to 54.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to are here printed in full as follows:

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, the development of a State or nation depends upon its commerce. Progress and prosperity abound where transportation facilities are the best and easiest, be it by railway, by highway, or by waterway. The early history of Ohio, for example, is in part the story of the construction of canals, generally but 4 feet in depth. They reached almost every important city and town in the State. This was prior to the advent of the railroads. The Miami & Erie Canal, that extends between Cincinnati and Toledo, was financed chiefly by the State and Federal Governments. Bonds were issued by the State and sold throughout the country, and later the Federal Government, by an act of Congress passed in 1828, granted to the State of Ohio, to be disposed of by the legislature to aid in building the canal, a large tract of land lying between Dayton and the Maumee River, at the mouth of the Auglaize River.

No canal districts were established then by the legislature to assess a part of the cost of construction and maintenance upon those pioneers and landholders within 25 miles of each side of the canal. There were no $20-a-day men to appraise the benefits, no arbitrary distance from the canal whereby the benefits were considered to cease, because those early settlers rightfully felt that the construction of these canals were of State-wide and national importance.

The improvement of the Miami and Erie Canal, or any other route connecting Lake Erie with the Ohio River, is to-day just as important as it was then, and its benefits extend throughout the State of Ohio and into the adjoining States of Indiana, Kentucky, and even to Pennsylvania. Why, then, should a small body of taxpayers be compelled, chiefly by physical labor and effort on the farm, to have their land assessed for a preliminary survey, to meet a part of the cost of construction, and a third assessment for a part of the maintenance of the canal, when its benefits spread beyond this imaginary arbitrary dividing line?

The Army appropriation bill now under consideration in the House carries in it a sum of money to be used by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to conduct further survey of the various routes extending across the State of Ohio. It is the duty of this board to determine questions of cost, relative merit, economic necessity, and advisability of the routes now under consideration. When this appropriation becomes a law the question comes closer to the taxpayers within 25 miles of the Miami and Erie Canal, or any route that should be selected, as to whether a canal zone should be established as provided by the enabling act passed by the Legislature of Ohio in 1919.

This Ohio law is—to provide for the organization and administration of canal districts, granting the same power to impose taxes and assessments, to incur debts, issue bonds, and to assist the Federal Government in the construction of a canal or canals connecting Lake Erie with the Ohio River.

The law also provides that the boundaries of the canal district—shall follow a line 25 miles distant from and parallel to the median line of said proposed canal and the terminal boundaries shall follow the arc of a circle drawn with a radius of 25 miles distant from each terminus of the same, except that all counties lying in whole or in part within 60 miles of either terminus of said canal and connected by negotiable waters with either terminus thereof shall be included in said zone.

The law further provides that the voters within the boundaries of a district shall hold an election and determine whether a canal district shall be established and the taxpayers within the district shall be assessed for a portion of the cost of construction and maintenance of the canal.

I am opposed to the Ohio law because the Federal Government should pay all the operating expenses of the canal. The Board of Engineers in their report make this same recommendation. They state—

If a canal is undertaken, the United States in addition to contributing toward the construction cost will probably assume its maintenance and operation.

I am opposed to the law because the benefits of the construction of the canal will extend throughout Ohio and into adjoining States, and therefore the arbitrary boundary line, 25 miles from each side of the canal, is unfair, unjust, and unequitable. It imposes a heavy burden upon the few for the benefit of the many.

If the recommendation of these engineers is carried out the taxpayers within this boundary would be compelled to pay 70 per cent of the $195,000,000, the estimated cost of construction of the Miami & Erie Canal. The people in Kentucky, Michigan, Indiana, and Pennsylvania would obtain almost as much benefit as these few taxpayers lying within the district. The main object of a canal connecting Lake Erie with the Ohio River is the transportation of coal from Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania to the Lakes and the Northwest, and iron ore from the Northwest to the same States. Why should not all of these States participate in the cost of construction after Congress makes its appropriation? In support of the above statement I quote from the report of the Army engineers relating to assessments and benefits of the eastern route:

It is the opinion of the board that benefits due to the construction of a canal along any of the proposed routes can not equitably be assessed upon the theory that such benefits would extend only a certain specified distance from the route, although a portion of the benefits might equitably be assessed in this manner. A more just assessment must of necessity include certain areas of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky, and perhaps include a general levy on these States as a whole, including Ohio.

If Congress should determine that the Miami and Erie Canal should be reconstructed and appropriates a fund that is insufficient for this purpose, the balance of the money should be raised by an assessment upon the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Kentucky. This is what I have always contended for, and I am glad to see that the engineers of the War Department are of the same opinion.

In the great debate of 1830 in the United States Senate, Daniel Webster replied to Senator Hayne, of South Carolina, on the question "What interest has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio?"

If a canal appears to me to be of national importance or national magnitude—

Said Webster—

the power of the Government extends to the encouragement of works of that description.

I look upon a road over the Allegheny, a canal around the falls of the Ohio, or a canal or railway from the Atlantic to the western waters as being objects large and extensive enough to be fairly said to be for the common benefit.

A heavy assessment upon a few for the benefit of many is not a proper principle for constructing a barge canal. It has never been upheld and, in my opinion, never will be. The improvements made by our State and Nation should be paid for by a uniform rule of assessment; justice and equity requires it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For sanitation, quarantine, hospitals, and medical aid and support of the insane and of lepers, and aid and support of indigent persons legally within the Canal Zone, including expenses of their deportation when practicable, and including additional compensation to any officer of the United States Public Health Service detailed with the Panama Canal as chief quarantine officer, $500,000.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 120, line 19, after the word "officer," strike out "$500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$550,000."

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee on this item. The effect of the amendment I have offered is to increase the item for sanitation, quarantine, hospitals, medical care of the insane and lepers, and so forth, on the Panama Canal Zone, from $500,000 to $550,000. The amount requested for hospitals and sanitation by the Governor of the Canal Zone in the hearings before the committee was $655,000. This request was made by the man who has the administration of the work there, and who knows more about what is needed there than anyone else could know. After he came to Washington and had a conference with the Director of the Budget and was thoroughly impressed with the necessity for cutting down the appropriations as far as could be done, he finally consented or recommended to the committee the sum of $608,420, the very minimum that would be required for that purpose upon the Canal Zone. Now, I do not know why the committee disallowed the amount. They have cut the amount down from $608,420 to $500,000. As soon as the amount carried by the bill was made known by a cablegram to Governor Morrow he sent a cablegram back asking that the amount be increased to at least $550,000, the amount which he says is absolutely necessary in any view of the situation to take care of the sanitation and hospitalization of the zone.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield, does not that fact indicate that the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone did not know what he wanted, because he asked for $650,000 in the beginning, cut it down to $608,000, and finally decided that $550,000 was the proper amount? The committee, on the information which it had, decided that $500,000 was all that was necessary.

Mr. DENISON. Where did the gentleman get the information which justified the committee in believing that that amount would be sufficient?

Mr. MADDEN. We had the testimony which——

Mr. DENISON. It is not in the hearings, and I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to state what hearings or what information he had on the outside of which the House is not getting the benefit?

Mr. MADDEN. We have information which led us to conclude that $500,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The House is entitled to the same information.

Mr. DENISON. The House is entitled to any information the gentleman has, and I think in view of the situation the committee ought to have it. I have read the hearings carefully, and when the governor has recommended $550,000 as the minimum amount that will be required for this important branch of the service on the Canal Zone I do not think the committee ought to just arbitrarily cut off $50,000 from that amount as an alleged economy. Governor Morrow is an able man. He is economizing in every way possible. He knows what is absolutely needed for sanitation down there, and the committee does not know.

Mr. STEVENSON. What was the recommendation of the Director of the Budget?

Mr. DENISON. I do not know. You will have to ask the chairman of the committee for that. I am only giving what the governor requested and what he states is absolutely necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENISON. This is a very important item. Gentlemen, the thing that enabled this Government to dig the Panama Canal was the work of sanitation and hospitalization on the Canal Zone. The man who did more than anyone else to accomplish this great enterprise was Surgeon General Gorgas, and in order to operate the canal successfully and preserve the lives and health of the Americans who must remain there and keep the canal in operation it is absolutely necessary to take every possible care of the sanitary conditions down there and keep the hospitals supplied with the best personnel and equipment.

Now, the Governor of the Canal Zone, who knows more than anyone else, and who I know is trying to economize, says he has got to have, if he keeps up the work of sanitation on the Canal Zone, and in order to keep fever down, in order to keep pestilence down, at least $550,000, and this subcommittee arbitrarily cuts it down to $500,000. I do not think it is right. I do not think we ought to jeopardize our project there by making this assault on the appropriation for sanitation and hospitals. It is an unwise step, in my judgment. It is a false economy.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that the insurance runs from 25 to 50 per cent higher there than it is here?

Mr. DENISON. I do know this, that this money is not coming out of the Treasury except in an indirect way, because the canal is paying its own way. We are now getting in tolls more than we spend to operate the canal.

Mr. MADDEN. How much interest do we pay annually?

Mr. DENISON. We have not been paying any interest.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; we are paying interest on the bonded debt.

Mr. DENISON. We are not paying it out of the revenues of the canal.

Mr. MADDEN. I know we are not. The gentleman says the revenues of the canal are sufficient to meet the needs.

Mr. DENISON. I think they are sufficient to meet the operating expenses.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say they are not sufficient to meet the needs, by a long way.

Mr. DENISON. I am saying this, in order that we may not have any misunderstanding, that the tolls of the canal are more than paying the operating expenses, and if I could have my way they would be even more than they are now. I have a bill pending now to increase the tolls, but it could not pass the Senate.

This is a serious proposition. If the governor of the canal puts the lowest estimate at $550,000, I think the Congress ought to allow it. It is necessary to keep the Canal Zone in a sanitary condition for the men who have to go down there and run the canal. A force of men are kept busy oiling every place where water can accumulate in order to keep down the mosquitoes, which spread malaria and other tropical diseases. We have made the zone safe for white men to live and labor. We must keep it safe, and we must provide the very best hospital services that can be obtained.

Mr. LAYTON. What does the gentleman understand by the meaning of the words on line 14, beginning "aid and support of indigent persons legally within the Canal Zone"? Does that embark on a proposition for the United States to take care of indigent persons?

Mr. DENISON. That is language that we have carried in every appropriation bill ever since we have been constructing and operating the canal.

Mr. LAYTON. What does it mean?

Mr. DENISON. You will have to ask the chairman of the committee. I am not informed about that. At any rate, gentlemen, if we keep the canal a success and continue its operations successfully, we have got to preserve sanitary conditions down there, and anybody who has been there knows that. All I know about the amount required is what the governor of the canal has said to the committee and has said to me.

Mr. WALSH. Is this $50,000 additional necessary in order to wipe out the mosquitoes?

Mr. DENISON. It is necessary for the purpose for which it is offered, for sanitation and hospitalization. I only mentioned mosquitoes as one of the many necessary uses for which the money is needed.

Mr. WALSH. How does the gentleman arrive at the figure that it is just $50,000 more?

Mr. DENISON. From the governor, who has charge of the administration of the canal, and who knows the conditions and says that it is necessary.

Mr. WALSH. He says that $608,000 is necessary.

Mr. DENISON. But at the request of the Director of the Budget he has reduced it to what he considered the very minimum amount necessary in the interest of economy. Now, it seems to me the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to understand that proposition. The governor gave what he thought he ought to have in the first instance. Then when he was impressed with the necessity for economy he reduced it as low as he thought he could with safety, and he now says $550,000 is necessary, and he has sent a cablegram here since this bill was reported saying that he ought to have this much money.

If we must sacrifice some service, some activity, on the Canal Zone in the interest of economy, I think, gentlemen, we ought to select some other service rather than sanitation and hospitals. Whatever else we do or do not do down there, we ought by all means to keep the zone safe from the various forms of disease that usually infest such tropical countries, and we ought to give assurance to our officials and our employees and to our military and naval men who have to remain there, as well as to their families, that the Government will afford them at all times the very best hospital facilities.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a difference of $50,000 between the opinion of the committee and the opinion of the canal officials as to the amount of money that is necessary for the conduct of the hospital facilities on the Canal Zone for the next year. The gentleman from Illinois would perhaps lead the House to believe this $50,000 was all the money that was utilized in the Canal Zone for that purpose, but the principal hospital activity down there is the maintenance of the Ancon Hospital. That has a revenue of $680,000 per annum in addition to the $500,000 which is appropriated in this bill. The committee decided, after a very careful investigation, that that hospital had too many high-salaried employees. They have been hanging on there for years, from the time when we were employing nearly 100,000 men down there to dig the canal, and ever since that time this same bunch of high-salaried employees has been maintained. They are getting figures largely in excess of what is necessary for hospitals in this country. The fact that we have maintained this large force from year to year led the committee to think that some of these high prices should be chopped off, and so we made a reduction of $50,000 in the total revenues of the hospital that will approximately run up to $1,000,000 per annum.

Mr. LAYTON. What does the chairman of the subcommittee say is meant by those words about which I questioned the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]?

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. The words "aid and support of indigent persons legally within the Canal Zone." Are we spending money for the indigent on the Canal Zone?

Mr. ANTHONY. We are. We not only do that, but we have a leper colony there, and we have a number of activities of that kind.

Mr. LAYTON. Is this a sort of eleemosynary institution—an almshouse?

Mr. ANTHONY. Largely, and this hospital does a large amount of work for the Government at Panama, and the receipts are not reflected in this bill, but the income is $608,000 from private sources.

Mr. TILSON. Does not my friend from Delaware recognize that we are a sort of board of aldermen, and all the rest, for all these people, and that we must take care of the poor and indigent at this place, the same as local authorities do here?

Mr. LAYTON. Excuse me. I am getting tender as to what we are doing in a communistic way.

Mr. TILSON. If that were done in a State, that would be a proper designation for it, but not in Panama.

Mr. ANTHONY. And the sanitation on the Canal Zone is good at this time. There is no complaint about health conditions, and the usual amount of money will be expended for that high state of sanitation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wanted to ask the chairman of the subcommittee what the recommendation of the Budget Bureau was on this item?

Mr. ANTHONY. Six hundred and eight thousand four hundred dollars.

Mr. STEVENSON. You cut off $108,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill provides an increase in the salary of certain officers on the Canal Zone which was recommended, and which, I think, went into effect January 1, 1922?

Mr. ANTHONY. Instead of providing an increase, I think we have provided here that there shall be no increase of salaries under the appropriations in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. There was not any increase granted to these officers to pay the amount charged for housing facilities?

Mr. ANTHONY. There was an increase granted by Executive order, and we put a provision in the bill which will take care of that situation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Well, while you put in the bill a provision that will take care of that situation, providing an increase of pay to cover the renting facilities of the officers, yet the housing facilities of the Canal Zone employees and the light and sanitation privileges have been taken away from them. Is not that a fact?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true. Heretofore the employees upon the Canal Zone have had the free use of housing. They have had light and electricity, and free water, and all of those things. They have even had their yards taken care of, and flower beds planted for them, at no cost to themselves. Now, that order has gone into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. That order requires them to pay a reasonable amount, and the men object very strenuously to it. Since that order was issued the Governor of the Canal Zone has granted to certain of the higher-salaried officers an increase of $50 to $75 per month in salaries, which looks on its face like a sum calculated to absorb the amount to be paid for rent. But to be fair to the governor and to these officials, it should be stated that most of them are officers of the Army or of the Navy, assigned for duty down on the Canal Zone, who would be entitled to free quarters, and therefore there is some merit in the position taken by the governor that they should not be compelled to pay for quarters on the Canal Zone.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit me, is it not a fact that most of the American employees went down to work on the Canal Zone because these privileges were offered to them, of free lighting and sanitation and rent? The conditions down there are different from what they are in our own country here. A mechanic in this country when he loses a job can go out and hunt for another one, whereas on the Canal Zone if he loses his job there is no place for him to go.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that the committee made careful inquiry in regard to the labor conditions down there. We heard the officials of the Canal Zone, and we heard the representatives of organized labor; and while the men complained very bitterly at the proposed changes, it is the opinion of the committee that the men are most liberally treated down there. It is true that reductions have been made in wages, but reductions in wages have been made in this country, and the men down there are still paid fully 25 per cent more for their services than similar employees receive in this country, and the Government is more liberal in the matter of leaves and all that sort of thing than any private employer.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have read the report made by the special committee, and I can not agree with all that is contained in that report. If I recall correctly, in one place it recommended that white Americans shall be superseded by alien blacks. If you are going to keep up the high standard of American workmen on that Canal Zone, we have got to take care of them and make their conditions as comfortable as they can possibly be made; and I think it is hardly fair to raise the salaries of the officers on the Canal Zone and take these lighting and housing facilities for the employees away from them at the same time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that in regard to the proposition to supersede white labor with black labor on the Canal Zone, that is intended to substitute natives for a class of white employees down there, and the gentleman can be assured that black labor will not be substituted for the higher trades and mechanical employments.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A committee of the Panama Canal Zone employees came to me not long ago and said they were afraid that these conditions that have been put into effect upon the recommendation of this special committee were going to work in such a way that in a short time the high-class standard of American employees that we have had on the Canal Zone would be materially reduced, that the men would not stay there unless they could get these special privileges.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to some of the recommendations made by the special committee in regard to employees at the Canal Zone, which I do not believe are for the best interest of the Government. This is one of their recommendations.

POLICE DEPARTMENT.

It says that employees get 14 per cent more pay than District of Columbia police, and favors replacing police guards at piers, at the administration building, and so forth, with alien negroes.

Now, this is the report of that committee that investigated there. They favor discharging every single white employee and substituting for them colored men from Jamaica, not one of whom is a citizen. What do you think of that kind of a policy?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman does not mean to imply that all of those recommendations have been adopted by the Governor of the Canal Zone?

Mr. NORTON. The majority of them have. That the police on the dock—at a place where we have spent millions of dollars, and where a bomb could blow a large part of it into eternity, causing untold damage—they recommend the discharge of all white laborers, who are American citizens, and the substituting in their place of alien laborers, not one of whom is a citizen of the United States, men from Jamaica. There are many other recommendations, among them the following:

Cut out cattle industry, farms, plantations, and dairies.

Replace gold employees with silver employees.

Replace all American chauffeurs with silver labor.

No more free transportation to work.

All recommendations seem to be unfavorable to the white employees, the American citizens, at the Canal Zone.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who wrote that special report?

Mr. NORTON. This special committee. Is not that a fact?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very much obliged to the gentleman if he will point out the page of the report where that recommendation is made. I hold that report in my hand, the report of that special committee, and I would like to know where it makes any such broad recommendation as the gentleman claims.

Mr. NORTON. I will have to get back the original typewritten report which I had, which I let another party take.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have a copy of the printed report here.

Mr. NORTON. It is not a printed report. It is a typewritten report, and I let another party take the original.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hold in my hand the report of the special Panama Canal Commission, the letter from the Governor of the Panama Canal to the Secretary of War. I have read that report from cover to cover, and I find nothing to warrant the statements made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. NORTON. That is the recommendation, word for word, and I will get the original report if the gentleman wants it, giving the language that was taken down by the stenographer, which I have read.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] if that report that he just referred to recommends taking away from the Panama Canal employees the housing facilities?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; and the Governor of the Panama Canal increased the salaries of some of the high-priced employees, and your committee believed in treating all alike, and put a provision in this bill whereby they could not be increased to take care of the amount of rent that they will be obliged to pay in the future. We are treating all alike.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Did you increase the salary of the governor?

Mr. STAFFORD. We did not, nor did we provide for the $4,000 recommended for the purpose of his entertaining guests going through the canal.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Did the special report provide for that?

Mr. STAFFORD. It was not recommended by the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War is not responsible, and your committee is not responsible for the recommendations of that special committee.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The commission was appointed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the Secretary of War and the Budget officer have not made any such outlandish recommendation.

Mr. NORTON. I have read the recommendation for the police department. Now, I will read the recommendation for the fire department. Is not this the report of the commission?

Let me read the recommendation with reference to the fire department:

Employees get 11 per cent more pay than District of Columbia firemen. Volunteer white firemen of Balboa, Cristobal, Pedro Miguel, and Gatun, and cut down paid force, substituting negroes. Apply two-platoon system under conditions recommended.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman understands that the law gives these men 25 per cent more pay.

Mr. NORTON. I appreciate that, but was not this in the report?

Mr. ANTHONY. The governor told us that the men are receiving the full 25 per cent.

Mr. NORTON. Let me read the names of the parties who signed this report that constituted this special committee sent to the Panama Canal Zone. It was composed of Gen. William D. Conner, United States Army; Capt. Alfred Brooks Frey, United States Naval Reserve; Mr. H. P. Wilson; and Mr. F. A. Moliter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For civil government of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone: Salaries of district judge, $7,500; district attorney, $5,000; marshal, $5,000; and for gratuities and necessary clothing for indigent discharged prisoners, $875,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for making payments to the Government of Panama for postage stamps.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let it be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 130, lines 23 and 25, after the word "prisoners," strike out the figures $875,000 and the proviso "that no part of this sum shall be used for making payments to the Government for postage stamps," and insert in lieu thereof "$915,000."

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman before pressing the point of order if the salary of the United States marshal has not been increased under this item from what is authorized by law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not that I know of.

Mr. WALSH. It was carried for $5,000 last year and the year before, but my recollectiton is that that is a $500 increase from the basic salary.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee has no information in that regard. It was carried at $5,000 last year, and I believe in preceding bills it was for $5,000.

Mr. WALSH. I think during the war, because of certain conditions, it was felt that the salary might be increased, and it was permitted in an appropriation bill to increase it to $5,000. Of course, that is more than a great many United States marshals get in this country. I do not know as there is anything particular down there now after the war is over which would, in view of the fact that other high officers have been subjected to a reduction of salary, call for the continuance of this salary at $5,000. I may be in error as to the basic salary.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. In regard to this appropriation for indigent discharged prisoners, $875,000, which I understand is to be changed by amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. That covers all the civil expenses of the island, and the relief of indigent prisoners is a very small part of it.

Mr. BURTON. That covers back to the top of page 120?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; simply for the civil government of the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me that it is a little mite doubtful.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I talked with my friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], who has visited the Canal Zone and is more familiar with conditions there than I am, never having been there myself, and he thinks that irrespective of the basic salary the point of order ought not to be pressed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have looked up the basic salary and I find that authority is given to the President to fix the salary of the officer in question, and it has evidently been fixed by Executive order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 130, lines 23 and 25, after the word "prisoners," in line 23, strike out $875,000 and the language "provided that no part of this sum shall be used for making payments to the Government of Panama for postage stamps" and insert in lieu thereof "$915,000."

Mr. ANTHONY. When the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone was before the committee he recommended that the payment of postage from the Canal Zone be discontinued. The committee thought that it was proper that it should be discontinued as investigation showed that it was not based on any law that we could find. The only authority was a supplementary agreement made by Mr. Taft many years ago that we would pay them annually this sum in lieu of postage from the Canal Zone.

All this was done after we had agreed to pay the Panaman Government $250,000 annually in lieu of all claims of this kind. This agreement was undoubtedly of a supplementary nature, and while there was legislation afterwards which was supposed to ratify all Executive acts, yet there is some doubt as to our authority to appropriate the money. However, since the action of your committee was taken and this language was inserted in the bill, the State Department believes that it would be hardly advisable at this time to discontinue making that payment. Therefore, the committee asks that that language be stricken from the bill and that the appropriation be increased to $915,000 to take care of the payment.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas by striking the figures "$915,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$950,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DENISON to the amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Strike out "$915,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$950,000."

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, the Governor of the Panama Canal Zone estimated for the civil government of the Canal Zone, before he appeared before the Budget Committee—that is, when he sent in his estimates—that it would require $991,815. After his conference with the Director of the Budget, and after being appealed to to make a reduction in these requirements, he reduced the estimate down to $973,240 as the minimum, and that is the very lowest that he recommended up to that time. The governor sent a cablegram since the bill was reported, which I want to read. He undoubtedly sent it to the chairman of the committee. I simply have a copy of it. The cablegram reads as follows:

It is impracticable to continue civil government expenditures at the rate of expenditure for 1922. Both these services were considered carefully by the Budget officer with data at hand last fall. Later data enables me to agree that their recommendations can be reduced to figures above given ($950,000), but to advise that any further cut can be accomplished only by abandonment of some necessary service.

The governor down there has been economizing in every way possible, and during the war he cut the expenditures down just as low as he could. They allowed a great many things to get out of repair, and that explains the statement. I give this for what it may be worth. Here is the testimony of the man who knows and who is responsible down there, and he says that any further cut must be accomplished by the abandonment of certain services down there. That means any cut below the $950,000, and yet the committee has arbitrarily refused to allow more than $915,000. I do not think that ought to be done. I think we are now beginning to gradually encroach upon the efficiency of the organization at the Panama Canal, and it is up to the Congress to say whether you want to do it or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has the gentleman considered that the current year's appropriation is $900,000, $15,000 less than we are proposing now, that what the committee proposes is an increase, and that the population down there is being reduced.

Mr. DENISON. The governor says it is impracticable to run the Government on the same expenditures as last year.

Mr. ANTHONY. But we are giving him $15,000 more.

Mr. DENISON. No; you are giving him $35,000 less than he asked for.

Mr. ANTHONY. But $15,000 more than he asked for this year.

Mr. DENISON. He is now asking for $950,000 as a minimum; and I think the committee ought to observe the governor's suggestion and grant the amount he says is absolutely necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think there should be a correction in punctuation in line 23, page 130, and that the comma there after the word "prisoners" should be changed to a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent that the total amount in line 1, page 131, may be increased by $40,000 and the totals corrected elsewhere wherever it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the foregoing appropriations for the Panama Canal shall be used to pay the salary for any position at a rate in excess of the rate in effect for such position on June 30, 1921.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph beginning in line 8 and ending in line 11.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the gentleman's point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised as to what the gentleman makes the point of order against.

Mr. DENISON. Against the paragraph beginning in line 8, page 131.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is purely a limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, if the gentleman would like to be heard——

Mr. DENISON. Unless, of course, the Chair has made up his mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks very clearly it is a limitation of appropriation. He has ruled that way a number of times, but if the gentleman has something to say, however, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. DENISON. I had something to say, but I do not want to talk just to hear myself talking. If the Chair has made up his mind, I do not want to be heard, but I think this paragraph in the bill is not in order. I think, while it is a limitation, it changes existing law, and I think it does not reduce expenditures as far as appears on the face of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has repeatedly during the progress of this bill ruled in order paragraphs very much like this on the ground that they were limitations. The Chair has no possible question whatever as to its being a limitation, pure and simple, and he overrules the point of order.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I move to strike out of the bill the paragraph beginning in line 8 and running to line 11, page 131.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DENISON: Page 131, strike out all of lines 8 to 11, inclusive.

Mr. DENISON. Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how long he is going to keep the committee in session? I would like to have a fuller attendance of the committee here when we discuss this matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Our intention was to finish the reading of the bill and have the bill reported back to the House, and, after the previous question is moved, to adjourn.

Mr. DENISON. I wish the chairman of the committee would let this matter go over until we have more Members here.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not think that would be necessary. There are only two or three paragraphs, which have been carried for several years, remaining to be read.

Mr. DENISON. I think this paragraph is of considerable importance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hardly think we would be justified in doing that.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss this.

Now, the existing law, the Panama Canal act, provides that the salary of the canal employees may be fixed by the President, not to exceed 25 per cent above the existing wages for similar employment in the Government service in the States. That is the fundamental law of the Canal Zone, and has been since 1912, and in the construction of that fundamental act the canal administration has been paying all employees on the Canal Zone since 1912 the same wages that are paid for similar work in this country plus 25 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman says all employees. Does not this refer to skilled mechanics?

Mr. DENISON. No; they have been paying all white employees the prevailing wages in this country plus 25 per cent.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. You can not classify common laborers in the statement you have been making, can you? The gentleman means mechanics, bricklayers, carpenters, machinists, and so forth.

Mr. DENISON. No; the gentleman is mistaken. All white employees on the Canal Zone are paid 25 per cent above similar employment in the States.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. How could you base common labor in the United States?

Mr. DENISON. I am not saying common labor; I say all white labor, and as a rule it is only white labor that is used in skilled employment. Now, gentlemen, this may not appear of much importance to you, but I know it is of great importance to the working forces of the Canal Zone. Most of our men down there have been there for a number of years. Conditions of living are not the same there as here. The Government has adopted and followed the policy of paying 25 per cent higher wages down there than is paid here in the States, and that policy is provided for by the Panama Canal act.

Now, here is a proviso put in the bill which changes that existing law. In other words, the rate of wages that has been paid since 1912 can no longer be paid, and we are changing existing law. I think that paragraph is out of order, in the first place, because it does change existing law and does not upon its face reduce expenditures.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You say the salaries of none of these people have been raised since 1921?

Mr. DENISON. It depends on whether the salaries in the United States have been increased. There have been some decreases. I doubt whether this bill decreases expenditures at all, because when wages are reduced in the United States they have to automatically reduce them on the Canal Zone.

Mr. ANTHONY. The increases have not been made in the salaries of mechanics and laborers, and this provides only for the salaries of about half a dozen on the Canal Zone.

Mr. DENISON. It applies to all down there.

Mr. ANTHONY. It says "salaries," not wages. Most of the employees are on a per diem basis, and the word "salary" would not affect them at all.

Mr. DENISON. I want to discuss this question of salaries which, I think, the gentleman has reference to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can read, if the gentleman wants me, the salaries he has reference to.

Mr. DENISON. There are just 19 men you have reference to?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Here is the situation: All during the war, when wages were mounting higher and higher in the States, they automatically increased in the Canal Zone, but the governor appealed to his official force there, the marine superintendent and others—I think there were 19 or 20 of them—to not ask any increase in their compensation on account of the increased cost of operating the canal, and the decrease in the canal revenues. As the world's shipping was destroyed the canal revenue kept decreasing each year. But the expenses of the canal kept increasing. Now, the governor appealed to these men, 19 or 20 of them, to not ask for any increases but to go ahead and work on the same salaries, and every one of them did so. They never have asked for an increase and never have received any. The Government, of course, has been furnishing them living quarters, houses and all the other emoluments that have gone to all the other employees of the canal. Now, recently the administration has changed its policy down there, and they all are now required to pay rent, which I think is the proper thing. But the result of it is that these officials, who were faithful during the war and never asked for an increase and never received any, have had their wages reduced, whereas everybody else down there has had an increase.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEGG. Is not it a fact that practically everybody has had his wages reduced within the past two years?

Mr. DENISON. I think that is the case, as a rule.

Mr. BEGG. And these men are no exception to anybody else, either in the service or out of the service.

Mr. DENISON. I think they are, because they did not get an increase during the war. The only others that I know of that did not get an increase are the Members of Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I can not understand why the gentleman from Illinois includes skilled mechanics in this group he is talking about, because they are paid on an hourly basis—so much an hour.

Mr. DENISON. In what group?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In this group where he says the salaries will be reduced.

Mr. MADDEN. There is nobody reduced, except 16.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman is mistaken. The governor has sent a communication which says that he has reduced the force down there, and he has added duties to some of the other employees, and by reason of their added duties and responsibilities he has increased their salaries. Now, this limitation will take away this increase which has been given to them by reason of their increased duties.

Mr. MADDEN. That is exactly what we intend to do, take it away from them. He had no authority to give it to them in the beginning.

Mr. DENISON. I think he has. He has been cutting down the force of employees and reducing the number of men working down there—I think from 18,000 to about 11,000. Now, as the result of that reduction in force he has put extra duties upon some of those that are remaining, and he has, by reason of combining these jobs, if I may use that term, added additional duties to those who are there, and he ought to give them a little increase. But this will prevent him from doing so. I think this limitation ought to be stricken from the bill, and I hope you will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. FISH. I rise to ask unanimous consent to return to page 91 to enable me to offer a single amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to page 91 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, has an objection been made?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi reserved the right to object.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To strike out the last word.

Mr. FISH. Has any objection been made to my request?

Mr. SISSON. Several objections have been made, but in order to test the question I will withdraw my objection and see if anybody else objects.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let us know what the gentleman's amendment is.

Mr. FISH. It is an amendment to increase the salary of the organist from $1,500 to $2,000 at the Military Academy at West Point. You started on the consideration of the bill at about page 90 on Saturday, when I did not happen to be here. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment. I do not think the chairman of the subcommittee has any objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to say that the gentleman from New York is interested in the Military Academy at West Point, inasmuch as he lives near there. He was not here when we passed that particular item on Saturday. I told him I would not object if he asked to return to page 90 for the purpose of offering a single amendment without extended debate.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that an amendment is pending which ought to be disposed of first. I do not object to the gentleman's request to return to page 91 later on.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, there is not a quorum present. I understood they were going to try to get through the bill this afternoon and move the previous question. Now, it seems it is proposed to return to a part of the bill that has been passed. If you are going to return to page 91 and offer an amendment, it may have to be debated, and somebody else may offer another amendment, and I will call for a quorum, because I am not going to agree to it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. TILSON). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 91, line 13, strike out "$1,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. The point of order is that that is a change of law, not authorized by law. This committee has religiously refrained from increasing any salaries beyond the amount fixed by law. I do not want any gentleman here to offer an amendment in violation of that law now.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from New York able to cite to the Chair a law that will sustain his amendment?

Mr. FISH. I am not aware that there is any law against increasing the salary of this official.

Mr. SISSON. There is, though.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. A question of order is pending against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. In the absence of any law sustaining the gentleman's contention, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. I do so, Mr. Chairman, simply to remark that in the consideration of these Panama Canal items our minds are directed to the four corners of the Republic. Several days ago we heard from the storm-swept and rock-bound coast of Maine, and we found that the flag still flew there, and that the Republican majority was quite up to the standard. [Applause.] To-day, from the far-off Pacific, from Hawaii, comes the news that a Republican Delegate has been elected by the accustomed Republican majority. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we should have a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withdraw it if you are going to finish the bill to-night, but there is a lot of hot air being indulged in here.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In addition there is appropriated for the operation, maintenance, and extension of waterworks, sewers, and pavements in the cities of Panama and Colon, during the fiscal year 1923, the necessary portions of such sums as shall be paid as water rentals or directly by the Government of Panama for such expenses.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: Page 133, after line 8, add the following paragraph:

"In measuring vessels and determining the tolls to be paid thereon at the Panama Canal the measurement shall be made and tonnage determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules as they now exist or as they may be changed from time to time, and the tonnage arrived at by those rules shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the rate fixed by the President for the purpose of determining the tolls to be collected, and shall be the tonnage to which shall be applied the maximum and minimum rates now fixed by law or hereafter to be fixed for the purpose of determining the maximum and minimum tolls which may be charged.

"All laws and parts of laws, rules, and regulations in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. WALSH. Is this the provision which passed the House last year?

Mr. SISSON. Yes. My friend perhaps is familiar with the reason for this amendment. The amount that the Government lost last year by virtue of the present rules for the measurement of the tonnage of ships going through the canal was something over $2,000,000 in tolls. At this late hour I do not expect to go into any lengthly discussion, because the matter has been here before. This is urged very strongly by the authorities in control of the Panama Canal. It meets with the approval of the subcommittee, and I think of everyone who has investigated this matter. This amendment is in the exact language of the amendment which the authorities have heretofore asked. My impression is that this went through the House at one time and went out in the Senate. The present Governor of the Canal Zone is a man of ability, I think, and capable of making a success of that institution down there if we will give him leeway, and he is very anxious that this amendment shall go on. I agree with him very heartily. I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts will understand the proposition as well as any member of the subcommittee, because it has been before the House on a previous occasion.

Mr. MADDEN. It will bring about $2,000,000 a year revenue into the Treasury, will it not?

Mr. SISSON. A little over $2,000,000; yes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, this proposition came up as a separate bill in the last Congress. It was considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported to the House, and after a full debate was passed by an overwhelming vote of the House. It went to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and there it was put to sleep. Although I wrote several communications to the chairman of that committee and urged upon them the importance of this legislation and asked them to have a meeting and consider it and let the Senate consider it, there was never a meeting even called to consider it at the other end of the Capitol. This legislation is important by reason of the fact that the language used in the Panama Canal act, providing for the method of measuring vessels for the purpose of collecting tolls, was very unfortunate, so that when it was finally interpreted by the Attorney General's department it was held that the United States rules of measurement should apply instead of the Panama Canal rules, which Congress evidently intended should apply. The result is that under the present rules of measurement no cargo on the open deck of the ship is included in the measurement for tolls purposes. No space is counted except that which is inclosed. That is the United States rule.

In other words, under the United States rules of measurement only those parts of vessels are measured that are inclosed, while under the Panama Canal rules of measurement all parts of the vessel that are used for carrying cargo are measured. The Panama Canal act has been construed to require the United States rules of measurement. The result is that we collect no tolls at all for all that freight that can be and is carried on the open decks of vessels going through the canal. Lumber and cattle and other similar freight is loaded on the open decks and go through the canal free.

Clearly this ought not to be permitted, and this is especially so since the statistics show that over 80 per cent of the tolls we are losing by reason of the rules of measurement goes to foreign shippers while only about 20 per cent of it is saved to American shippers. We are losing about $2,000,000 in tolls each year, 80 per cent of which goes to foreign shippers. For this reason the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi ought to be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I recall the consideration of that measure, and I recall the explanation made in the last Congress. What I want to be sure of is that this is the identical act that previously passed the House. We have not had an opportunity to examine it, at least I did not know it was to be offered, and while it may be desirable to bring about what the House passed as a separate act on a previous occasion I think it is rather unwise to put a provision like this on an appropriation bill, when it is clearly legislation, unless the gentleman is sure that it is the same language which previously passed the House.

Mr. SISSON. It is the same language, but, of course, we passed it in the form of a bill.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proposed amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SISSON. I think the amendment I offer is clearly subject to a point of order under the previous rulings of the Chair, but I think, however, it is a point of order that ought not to be made, because by making it the Treasury loses or did lose last year a little more than $2,000,000 on the tonnage that passed through the canal.

Mr. CURRY. I make the point of order because it entails further tolls on the coastwise trade, and we ought not to collect any tolls at all on coastwise ships through the Panama Canal. It is an additional toll on the lumber that goes through the canal from the west to the east coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10871) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

PROHIBITING THE IMPORTATION AND USE OF NARCOTIC DRUGS.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 852) from the Committee on Ways and Means on H. R. 2193, amending the narcotic drug act.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2193) amending section 6 of the act approved January 17, 1914, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act prohibiting the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes,' approved February 9, 1909."

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARNER reserved all points of order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD which I made this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks made by me recently at a dinner given at the Hotel Ambassador, in New York, on the occasion of the fiftieth birthday of my friend, Charles W. Hoyt, head of the advertising firm of Hoyt's Service (Inc.). My subject was "Pending Tariff Legislation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9606. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, March 28, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

NAVAL ARMAMENT TREATY.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the pending treaty be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, proceeded to consider the treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the treaty.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is a very important treaty. I think we ought to have a quorum of the Senate present while the treaty is being read. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Caraway	Ernst	Hale
Ball	Colt	Fernald	Harris
Borah	Culberson	France	Harrison
Bursum	Cummins	Gerry	Johnson
Cameron	Dial	Glass	Jones, Wash.
Capper	Edge	Gooding	Kellogg
King	Oddie	Sheppard	Wadsworth
La Follette	Overman	Simmons	Walsh, Mass.
Lenroot	Owen	Spencer	Walsh, Mont.
Lodge	Page	Stanfield	Warren
McCormick	Pepper	Sterling	Watson, Ga.
McNary	Phipps	Sutherland	Williams
Moses	Pittman	Swanson	Willis
Myers	Poindexter	Townsend
Nelson	Pomerene	Trammell
New	Rawson	Underwood

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the treaty.

The reading of the treaty was resumed, and during the reading,

Mr. LODGE. Unless there is objection, I ask that there may be dispensed with the reading of section 2, comprising tables showing the figures as to the age and the tonnage of the ships from year to year, as provided for in the treaty. They are very complicated tables, but, of course, if any Senator desires to have them read they will be read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, they are really quite illuminating and instructive. I do not want to insist upon the reading if the Senator will explain them.

Mr. LODGE. Let them be read, then.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I suggest that no Senator can understand them from the reading, but any Senator may understand them from following the printed page.

Mr. LODGE. Never mind; let the tables be read.

The reading of the treaty was resumed and concluded, and it is as follows:

EXECUTIVE I.—LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, ITALY, AND JAPAN, AGREEING TO A LIMITATION OF NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan;

Desiring to contribute to the maintenance of the general peace and to reduce the burdens of competition in armament;

Have resolved, with a view to accomplishing these purposes, to conclude a treaty to limit their respective naval armament, and to that end have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Charles Evans Hughes, Henry Cabot Lodge, Oscar W. Underwood, Elihu Root, citizens of the United States;

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India: The Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, O. M., M. P., Lord President of His Privy Council; the Right Hon. Baron Lee of Fareham, G. B. E., K. C. B., First Lord of His Admiralty; the Right Hon. Sir Auckland Campbell Geddes, K. C. B., His Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States of America;

And for the Dominion of Canada: The Right Hon. Sir Robert Laird Borden, G. C. M. G., K. C.;

For the Commonwealth of Australia: Senator the Right Hon. George Foster Pearce, Minister for Home and Territories;

For the Dominion of New Zealand: The Hon. Sir John William Salmond, K. C., Judge of the Supreme Court of New Zealand;

For the Union of South Africa: The Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, O. M., M. P.;

For India: The Right Hon. Valingman Sankaranarayana Srinivasa Sastri, Member of the Indian Council of State;

The President of the French Republic: Mr. Albert Sarraut, Deputy, Minister of the Colonies; Mr. Jules J. Jusserand, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States of America, Grand Cross of the National Order of the Legion of Honor;

His Majesty the King of Italy: The Hon. Carlo Schanzer, Senator of the Kingdom; the Hon. Vittorio Rolandi Ricci, Senator of the Kingdom, His Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentary at Washington; the Hon. Luigi Albertini, Senator of the Kingdom;

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan: Baron Tomosaburo Kato, Minister for the Navy Junii, a member of the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun with the Paulownia Flower; Baron Kijuro Shidehara, His Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Washington, Joshii, a member of the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun; Mr. Masanao Hanihara, Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs, Jushii, a member of the Second Class of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun;

Who, having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

CHAPTER I.

General provisions relating to the limitation of naval armament.

ARTICLE I.

The contracting powers agree to limit their respective naval armament as provided in the present treaty.

ARTICLE II.

The contracting powers may retain, respectively, the capital ships which are specified in Chapter II, part 1. On the coming into force of the present treaty, but subject to the following provisions of this article, all other capital ships, built or building, of the United States, the British Empire, and Japan shall be disposed of as prescribed in Chapter II, part 2.

In addition to the capital ships specified in Chapter II, part 1, the United States may complete and retain two ships of the West Virginia class now under construction. On the completion of these two ships the North Dakota and Delaware shall be disposed of as prescribed in Chapter II, part 2.

The British Empire may, in accordance with the replacement table in Chapter II, part 3, construct two new capital ships not exceeding 35,000 tons (35,560 metric tons) standard displacement each. On the completion of the said two ships the Thunderer, King George V, Ajax, and Centurion shall be disposed of as prescribed in Chapter II, part 2.

ARTICLE III.

Subject to the provisions of Article II, the contracting powers shall abandon their respective capital ship building programs, and no new capital ships shall be constructed or acquired by any of the contracting powers except replacement tonnage which may be constructed or acquired as specified in Chapter II, part 3.

Ships which are replaced in accordance with Chapter II, part 3, shall be disposed of as prescribed in part 2 of that chapter.

ARTICLE IV.

The total capital ship replacement tonnage of each of the contracting powers shall not exceed in standard displacement, for the United States, 525,000 tons (533,400 metric tons); for the British Empire, 525,000 tons (533,400 metric tons); for France, 175,000 tons (177,800 metric tons); for Italy, 175,000 tons (177,800 metric tons); for Japan, 315,000 tons (320,040 metric tons).

ARTICLE V.

No capital ship exceeding 35,000 tons (35,560 metric tons) standard displacement shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers.

ARTICLE VI.

No capital ship of any of the contracting powers shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 16 inches (406 millimeters).

ARTICLE VII.

The total tonnage for aircraft carriers of each of the contracting powers shall not exceed in standard displacement, for the United States 135,000 tons (137,160 metric tons); for the British Empire 135,000 tons (137,160 metric tons); for France 60,000 tons (60,960 metric tons); for Italy 60,000 tons (60,960 metric tons); for Japan 81,000 tons (82,296 metric tons).

ARTICLE VIII.

The replacement of aircraft carriers shall be effected only as prescribed in Chapter II, part 3, provided, however, that all aircraft carrier tonnage in existence or building on November 12, 1921, shall be considered experimental, and may be replaced, within the total tonnage limit prescribed in Article VII, without regard to its age.

ARTICLE IX.

No aircraft carrier exceeding 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers.

However, any of the contracting powers may, provided that its total tonnage allowance of aircraft carriers is not thereby exceeded, build not more than two aircraft carriers, each of a tonnage of not more than 33,000 tons (33,528 metric tons) standard displacement, and in order to effect economy any of the contracting powers may use for this purpose any two of their ships, whether constructed or in course of construction, which would otherwise be scrapped under the provisions of Article II. The armament of any aircraft carriers exceeding 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement shall be in accordance with the requirements of Article X, except that the total number of guns to be carried in case any of such guns be of a caliber exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters), except antiaircraft guns and guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters), shall not exceed eight.

ARTICLE X.

No aircraft carrier of any of the contracting powers shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 8 inches (203 millimeters). Without prejudice to the provisions of Article IX, if the armament carried includes guns exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters) in caliber the total number of guns carried, except antiaircraft guns and guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters), shall not exceed 10. If alternatively the armament contains no guns exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters) in caliber, the number of guns is not limited. In either case the number of antiaircraft guns and of guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters) is not limited.

ARTICLE XI.

No vessel of war exceeding 10,000 tons (10,160 metric tons) standard displacement, other than a capital ship or aircraft carrier, shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers. Vessels not specifically built as fighting ships nor taken in time of peace under government control for fighting purposes, which are employed on fleet duties or as troop transports or in some other way for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of hostilities otherwise than as fighting ships, shall not be within the limitations of this article.

ARTICLE XII.

No vessel of war of any of the contracting powers hereafter laid down, other than a capital ship, shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 8 inches (203 millimeters).

ARTICLE XIII.

Except as provided in Article IX, no ship designated in the present treaty to be scrapped may be reconverted into a vessel of war.

ARTICLE XIV.

No preparations shall be made in merchant ships in time of peace for the installation of warlike armaments for the purpose of converting such ships into vessels of war, other than the necessary stiffening of decks for the mounting of guns not exceeding 6-inch (152 millimeters) caliber.

ARTICLE XV.

No vessel of war constructed within the jurisdiction of any of the contracting powers for a noncontracting power shall exceed the limitations as to displacement and armament prescribed by the present treaty for vessels of a similar type which may be constructed by or for any of the contracting powers: Provided, however, That the displacement for aircraft carriers constructed for a noncontracting power shall in no case exceed 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement.

ARTICLE XVI.

If the construction of any vessel of war for a noncontracting power is undertaken within the jurisdiction of any of the contracting powers, such power shall promptly inform the other contracting powers of the date of the signing of the contract and the date on which the keel of the ship is laid; and shall also communicate to them the particulars relating to the ship prescribed in Chapter II, part 3, section 1 (b), (4) and (5).

ARTICLE XVII.

In the event of a contracting power being engaged in war, such power shall not use as a vessel of war any vessel of war which may be under construction within its jurisdiction for any other power, or which may have been constructed within its jurisdiction for another power and not delivered.

ARTICLE XVIII.

Each of the contracting powers undertakes not to dispose by gift, sale, or any mode of transfer of any vessel of war in such a manner that such vessel may become a vessel of war in the navy of any foreign power.

ARTICLE XIX.

The United States, the British Empire, and Japan agree that the status quo at the time of the signing of the present treaty, with regard to fortifications and naval bases, shall be maintained in their respective territories and possessions specified hereunder:

(1) The insular possessions which the United States now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of the United States, Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, not including the Aleutian Islands, and (b) the Hawaiian Islands.

(2) Hongkong and the insular possessions which the British Empire now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, east of the meridian of 110° east longitude, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of Canada, (b) the Commonwealth of Australia and its territories, and (c) New Zealand.

(3) The following insular territories and possessions of Japan in the Pacific Ocean, to wit, the Kurile Islands, the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Loochoo Islands, Formosa, and the Pescadores, and any insular territories or possessions in the Pacific Ocean which Japan may hereafter acquire.

The maintenance of the status quo under the foregoing provisions implies that no new fortifications or naval bases shall be established in the territories and possessions specified; that no measures shall be taken to increase the existing naval facilities for the repair and maintenance of naval forces, and that no increase shall be made in the coast defenses of the territories and possessions above specified. This restriction, however, does not preclude such repair and replacement of worn-out weapons and equipment as is customary in naval and military establishments in time of peace.

ARTICLE XX.

The rules for determining tonnage displacement prescribed in Chapter II, part 4, shall apply to the ships of each of the contracting powers.

CHAPTER II.

Rules relating to the execution of the treaty—Definition of terms.

PART 2.

RULES FOR SCRAPPING VESSELS OF WAR.

The following rules shall be observed for the scrapping of vessels of war which are to be disposed of in accordance with Articles II and III:

I. A vessel to be scrapped must be placed in such condition that it can not be put to combatant use.

II. This result must be finally effected in any one of the following ways:

(a) Permanent sinking of the vessel.

(b) Breaking the vessel up. This shall always involve the destruction or removal of all machinery, boilers, and armor, and all deck, side, and bottom plating.

(c) Converting the vessel to target use exclusively. In such case all the provisions of paragraph 3 of this part, except subparagraph (6), in so far as may be necessary to enable the ship to be used as a mobile target, and except subparagraph (7), must be previously complied with. Not more than one capital ship may be retained for this purpose at one time by any of the contracting powers.

(d) Of the capital ships which would otherwise be scrapped under the present treaty in or after the year 1931, France and Italy may each retain two seagoing vessels for training purposes exclusively—that is, as gunnery or torpedo schools. The two vessels retained by France shall be of the Jean Bart class, and of those retained by Italy one shall be the Dante Alighieri, the other of the Giulio Cesare class. On retaining these ships for the purpose above stated, France and Italy, respectively, undertake to remove and destroy their conning towers, and not to use the said ships as vessels of war.

III. (a) Subject to the special exceptions contained in Article IX, when a vessel is due for scrapping, the first stage of scrapping, which consists in rendering a ship incapable of further warlike service, shall be immediately undertaken.

(b) A vessel shall be considered incapable of further warlike service when there shall have been removed and landed, or else destroyed in the ship—

(1) All guns and essential portions of guns, fire-control tops, and revolving parts of all barbettes and turrets;

(2) All machinery for working hydraulic or electric mountings;

(3) All fire-control instruments and range finders;

(4) All ammunition, explosives, and mines;

(5) All torpedoes, war heads, and torpedo tubes;

(6) All wireless telegraphy installations;

(7) The conning tower and all side armor, or alternately all main propelling machinery; and

(8) All landing and flying-off platforms, and all other aviation accessories.

IV. The periods in which scrapping of vessels is to be effected are as follows:

(a) In the case of vessels to be scrapped under the first paragraph of Article II, the work of rendering the vessels incapable of further warlike service, in accordance with paragraph 3 of this part, shall be completed within six months from the coming into force of the present treaty, and the scrapping shall be finally effected within 18 months from such coming into force.

(b) In the case of vessels to be scrapped under the second and third paragraphs of Article II, or under Article III, the work of rendering the vessel incapable of further warlike service in accordance with paragraph 3 of this part shall be commenced not later than the date of completion of its successor, and shall be finished within six months from the date of such completion. The vessel shall be finally scrapped, in accordance with paragraph 2 of this part, within 18 months from the date of completion of its successor. If, however, the completion of the new vessel be delayed, then the work of rendering the old vessel incapable of further warlike service in accordance with paragraph 3 of this part shall be commenced within four years from the laying of the keel of the new vessel, and shall be finished within six months from the date on which such work was commenced, and the old vessel shall be finally scrapped in accordance with paragraph 2 of this part within 18 months from the date when the work of rendering it incapable of further warlike service was commenced.

PART 3.

REPLACEMENT.

The replacement of capital ships and aircraft carriers shall take place according to the rules in section 1 and the tables in section 2 of this part.

SECTION I.

RULES FOR REPLACEMENT.

(a) Capital ships and aircraft carriers 20 years after the date of their completion may, except as otherwise provided in Article VIII and in the table in section 2 of this part, be replaced by new construction, but within the limits prescribed in Article IV and Article VII. The keels of such new construction may, except as otherwise provided in Article VIII and in the tables in section 2 of this part, be laid down not earlier than 17 years from the date of completion of the tonnage to be replaced, provided, however, that no capital ship tonnage, with the exception of the ships referred to in the third paragraph of Article II, and the replacement tonnage specifically mentioned in section 2 of this part, shall be laid down until 10 years from November 12, 1921.

(b) Each of the contracting powers shall communicate promptly to each of the other contracting powers the following information:

(1) The names of the capital ships and aircraft carriers to be replaced by new construction.

(2) The date of governmental authorization of replacement tonnage.

(3) The date of laying the keels of replacement tonnage.

(4) The standard displacement in tons and metric tons of each new ship to be laid down, and the principal dimensions, namely, length at water line, extreme beam at or below water line, mean draft at standard displacement.

(5) The date of completion of each new ship and its standard displacement in tons and metric tons, and the principal dimensions, namely, length at water line, extreme beam at or below water line, mean draft at standard displacement, at time of completion.

(c) In case of loss or accidental destruction of capital ships or aircraft carriers, they may immediately be replaced by new construction subject to the tonnage limits prescribed in Articles IV and VII and in conformity with the other provisions of the present treaty, the regular replacement program being deemed to be advanced to that extent.

(d) No retained capital ships or aircraft carriers shall be reconstructed except for the purpose of providing means of defense against air and submarine attack, and subject to the following rules: The contracting powers may, for that purpose, equip existing tonnage with bulge or blister or antiair attack deck protection, providing the increase of displacement thus effected does not exceed 3,000 tons (3,048 metric tons) displacement for each ship. No alterations in side armor, in caliber, number or general type of mounting of main armament shall be permitted except:

(1) In the case of France and Italy, which countries within the limits allowed for bulge may increase their armor protection and the caliber of the guns now carried on their existing capital ships so as not to exceed 16 inches (406 millimeters) and

(2) The British Empire shall be permitted to complete, in the case of the Renown, the alterations to armor that have already been commenced but temporarily suspended.

NOTE.—A, B, C, D, etc., represent individual capital ships of 35,000 tons standard displacement, laid down and completed in the years specified.

STANDARD DISPLACEMENT.

The standard displacement of a ship is the displacement of the ship complete, fully manned, engined, and equipped ready for sea, including all armament and ammunition, equipment, outfit, provisions and fresh water for crew, miscellaneous stores and implements of every description that are intended to be carried in war, but without fuel or reserve feed water on board.

The word "ton" in the present treaty, except in the expression "metric tons," shall be understood to mean the ton of 2,240 pounds (1,016 kilos).

Vessels now completed shall retain their present ratings of displacement tonnage in accordance with their national system of measurement. However, a power expressing displacement in metric tons shall be considered for the application of the present treaty as owning only the equivalent displacement in tons of 2,240 pounds.

A vessel completed hereafter shall be rated at its displacement tonnage when in the standard condition defined herein.

CHAPTER III.

Miscellaneous provisions.

ARTICLE XXI.

If during the term of the present treaty the requirements of the national security of any contracting power in respect of naval defense are, in the opinion of that power, materially affected by any change of circumstances, the contracting powers will, at the request of such power, meet in conference with a view to the reconsideration of the provisions of the treaty and its amendment by mutual agreement.

In view of possible technical and scientific developments the United States, after consultation with the other contracting powers, shall arrange for a conference of all the contracting powers which shall convene as soon as possible after the expiration of eight years from the coming into force of the present treaty to consider what changes, if any, in the treaty may be necessary to meet such developments.

ARTICLE XXII.

Whenever any contracting power shall become engaged in a war which in its opinion affects the naval defense of its national security, such power may after notice to the other contracting powers suspend for the period of hostilities its obligations under the present treaty other than those under Articles XIII and XVII, provided that such power shall notify the other contracting powers that the emergency is of such a character as to require such suspension.

The remaining contracting powers shall in such case consult together with a view to agreement as to what temporary notifications, if any, should be made in the treaty as between themselves. Should such consultation not produce agreement, duly made in accordance with the constitutional methods of the respective powers, any one of said contracting powers may, by giving notice to the other contracting powers, suspend for the period of hostilities its obligations under the present treaty, other than those under Articles XIII and XVII.

On the cessation of hostilities the contracting powers will meet in conference to consider what modifications, if any, should be made in the provisions of the present treaty.

ARTICLE XXIII.

The present treaty shall remain in force until December 31, 1936, and in case none of the contracting powers shall have given notice two years before that date of its intention to terminate the treaty it shall continue in force until the expiration of two years from the date on which notice of termination shall be given by one of the contracting powers, whereupon the treaty shall terminate as regards all the contracting powers. Such notice shall be communicated in writing to the Government of the United States, which shall immediately transmit a certified copy of the notification to the other powers and inform them of the date on which it was received. The notice shall be deemed to have been given and shall take effect on that date. In the event of notice of termination being given by the Government of the United States, such notice shall be given to the diplomatic representatives at Washington of the other contracting powers, and the notice shall be deemed to have been given and shall take effect on the date of the communication made to the said diplomatic representatives.

Within one year of the date on which a notice of termination by any power has taken effect, all the contracting powers shall meet in conference.

ARTICLE XXIV.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting powers in accordance with their respective constitutional methods and shall take effect on the date of the deposit of all the ratifications, which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible. The Government of the United States will transmit to the other contracting powers a certified copy of the procès verbal of the deposit of ratifications.

The present treaty, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall remain deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States, and duly certified copies thereof shall be transmitted by that Government to the other contracting powers.

In faith whereof the above-named plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty.

Done at the city of Washington the 6th day of February, 1922.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive L, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament, concluded at Washington February 6, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, was approved on July 12, 1921. The last section of that bill, section 9, reads as follows:

That the President is authorized and requested to invite the Governments of Great Britain and Japan to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval expenditures and building programs of each of said Governments, to wit, the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, shall be substantially reduced annually during the next five years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which understanding or agreement is to be reported to the respective Governments for approval.

That is the direct mandate of Congress, adopted, I believe, unanimously by both Houses, authorizing and requesting the President to invite a conference with the Governments of Great Britain and Japan for the purpose of reducing naval armaments. The invitation to that conference thus approved by Congress followed, and the President extended the limitations set by the congressional action so as to make the invitation to the conference include all forms of armament, and also to include in the naval section of the conference France and Italy as well as the three powers named in the act of Congress.

The conference met on the 12th day of November last, and its work, which was also extended by the President's invitation to cover questions of the Far East, has now been laid before the Senate for its advice and consent.

Although the American proposition in regard to naval reduction was set forth by Mr. Hughes at the first and opening plenary session of the conference, the question of land armament was taken up at the third plenary session a few days later, when the conference listened to the views of France as expressed by M. Briand. In regard to land armaments, I should premise what everyone, I think, knows, that the United States had reduced her land armament—that is, her armies—to a very low point; too low, I am inclined to think, for the necessary protection or defense of the United States and her interests. England had reduced her army to a very low point, and it is now being still further reduced, according to what we read in the dispatches. Italy had reduced her army. The French Army, of course, was not on the footing of the Great War, but was left at a very high point.

M. Briand, in a speech of great power and eloquence, as I thought, explained to the conference and to the world why it was impossible for France, with her proximity to Germany and the peril in which she felt she was always placed, to make any reduction in land armaments at that time. Of course, Mr. President, at this conference, as at all international conferences, unless a peace is being dictated by a conqueror, the nations meet on an equality and their action must be unanimous. When France stated to the conference that she could not, with a view to her safety, make any further reduction in her land forces there was nothing more that could be done. That put an end to any action by the conference on the matter of land armaments.

Now, Mr. President, I come to naval armaments, which was the subject of the congressional mandate and was recognized, I think, by everybody as the principal and most immediate purpose of the conference. I am going to take the liberty to say one word about my own personal course in regard to the Navy of the United States, which now extends over a good many years. I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House when in the year 1890 we authorized the first seagoing battleships, three in number—the Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Oregon—ships which all became famous subsequently in the war with Spain. From that day to the present time I have done all that lay in my power as an individual Member of the House, and as a Senator serving here as I have for many years on the Naval Affairs Committee, to uphold and advance the building of the American Navy and its maintenance in a position of strength and power. It was one of the objects that I had nearest to my heart in all my public life.

But I could not fail, Mr. President, to recognize the change in the world relations caused by the Great War with Germany which began in 1914. No one could possibly overlook the terrible conditions in which that war left the civilized world, and especially western Europe. The resolution of Congress, therefore, simply reflected what I think was the overwhelming desire of the American people, and I believe of the people of Great Britain and Japan as well, that these three great maritime powers should come to some agreement by which the burden of taxation caused by great naval armaments could be reduced, with the belief also in the minds of many persons that naval limitation would promote the cause of world peace.

Of course, Mr. President, I do not think anyone connected with the conference or in any way responsible for its action had the slightest sympathy with the proposition which has been put forward here and there of disarming by example; that is, that we should disarm entirely both by land and sea without any reference to what the other nations of the world did. If there is any arrangement about disarming or reduction of armaments which would infallibly promote war and make it more likely, it would be for one nation to reduce itself to an absolutey helpless position leaving the other nations of the world fully armed.

The only way to secure any real reduction in armaments was by international agreement, and that was the work which the American delegation took up; that was the purpose they had in mind.

The American delegates met repeatedly before November 11. They had in all 12 meetings, lasting always from two to four hours, and most of those hours were given to the question of the reduction of naval armament. From those meetings came the proposition which Mr. Hughes made on the 12th of November to the nine powers assembled at the council table in Washington.

I ought to say, as I wish the Senate to know as far as possible just exactly what we did, that during those meetings we had before us, in fact in constant consultation with us when the Navy was under discussion, representatives of the Navy Department. The Secretary came to one or two meetings and then deputed the Assistant Secretary, the Chief of Operations, Admiral Coontz, and Admiral Pratt, his assistant, to represent the department in our consultations. We also had the advantage of information and advice from the general board of the Navy.

There is one thing that is often overlooked in matters of this kind, and I should like to express it very plainly. It is not for technical experts to make this treaty any more than I regard it as the duty of technical experts to make the tariff bill. They are present to furnish information and advice on all technical points, and with that special knowledge which only those who devote their life to the subject can give. But the policy to be followed must be the policy of the Government, whether it is the Executive acting through his representatives in a negotiation with foreign powers or whether it is a committee of the House formulating a tariff bill or whether it is the Finance Committee of the Senate considering that bill for amendments. The idea should be dismissed that the naval experts were to formulate the policy to be pursued or that we should ever have allowed them to do it. The policy, be it good or bad, was the policy of the Government represented by the American delegates at the conference.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. The experts, of course, gave the delegates accurate estimates of tonnage and relative strength upon which the delegates based their action?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; they gave us every possible detail which we wanted, so that we could make all the comparisons of tonnage, of armaments, of caliber, of speed, and all that.

I only wanted to define exactly what their position was, because I have heard the matter discussed as if it was the business of experts to settle the policy. It was not. We had the very best technical advice that could be given. We had it given with all the sense possible of public responsibility. We had all the information which could be laid before us, and some of that information necessarily was confidential. There was no such thing, as I have seen alluded to, perhaps, in the newspapers, as secret reports. There were no secret reports made. Nothing was given us in that form by the experts except the tables and figures and comparisons, but there were facts which every service, military and naval, in every country for the protection of the Nation does not give to the world and ought to be very severely censured if it did.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator some questions for advice and because I have been somewhat troubled about it. The Senator will remember that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] discussed some days ago at very great length——

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and I am going to reply to that speech point by point.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I desire to ask the Senator is with reference to the selection by the United States of capital ships exclusively.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I should prefer to answer that when I come to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to take that all up and go into it, I am afraid, with a good deal of detail; I shall try to cover all those points.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not investigated the matter at all for myself, because I have not had the time. I understood the Senator from Missouri to say that Great Britain had retained quite a number of battle cruisers, that Japan had retained quite a number of battle cruisers, but we had not retained any.

Mr. LODGE. We retained none because we had none to retain.

Mr. SIMMONS. But we were contemplating building some.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we had begun to build some, and I shall explain by and by, if the Senator will allow me, just why we made the choice we did. It was done on what we thought the best naval advice.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the point I was going to ask the Senator about—whether this was done upon naval advice and whether the delegates accepted the opinion of experts.

Mr. LODGE. It certainly was; and we have followed exactly what they advised in that respect. Later I shall give very elaborate figures about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then in that particular the delegates did permit the naval experts to determine the matter for them?

Mr. LODGE. No; we took their advice on what ships were best to retain.

Mr. KING. Believing that battleships were better than cruisers?

Mr. LODGE. That was the conclusion reached by the Navy.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to hear the Senator upon that point.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming to it, but I can not take up a large question like this and deal only with certain points here and there. If the Senator will allow me, I would rather go through the treaty, and I think I can show how the whole thing developed.

I merely mention this to show that we had the very best naval advice there was from responsible men selected by the department, and that for all facts and details we rested upon them; but the general policy as to such a matter as a ratio, for example, after having all the facts before us, we decided for ourselves, and it could not be done in any other way.

Mr. President, the entire action of the delegation is set forth in their report, which I hope Senators have read with care, for they there would find everything pretty fully stated. However, I am going to follow it, without reading it, in order to try to put in somewhat condensed form just what the delegates did. We believed that there was an opportunity to make a very large reduction and a very effective limitation for the future. The general considerations which were deemed to be pertinent I shall read:

> The first is that the core of the difficulty is to be found in the competition in naval programs, and that, in order appropriately to limit naval armament, competition in its production must be abandoned. Competition will not be remedied by resolves with respect to the method of its continuance. One program inevitably leads to another, and if competition continues its regulation is impracticable. There is only one adequate way out and that is to end it now.

It is too often overlooked in the consideration of this subject that the most important single object which was accomplished was putting an end to naval competition. The spectacular feature was the scrapping large numbers of ships and putting an end to great naval building programs, but the most effective thing for the future in regard to naval armaments was the absolute stopping of competition. That was done by limiting the tonnage of capital ships and the calibers of the guns to be used. The American delegation also reached the conclusion that this great reduction—> can not be accomplished without serious sacrifices. Enormous sums have been expended upon ships under construction and building programs which are now under way can not be given up without heavy loss. Yet if the present construction of capital ships goes forward other ships will inevitably be built to rival them, and this will lead to still others. Thus the race will continue so long as ability to continue lasts. The effort to escape sacrifices is futile. We must face them or yield our purpose.

> It is also clear that no one of the naval powers should be expected to make these sacrifices alone. The only hope of limitation of naval armament is by agreement among the nations concerned, and this agreement should be entirely fair and reasonable in the extent of the sacrifices required of each of the powers. In considering the basis of such an agreement, and the commensurate sacrifices to be required, it is necessary to have regard to the existing naval strength of the great naval powers, including the extent of construction already effected in the case of ships in process. This follows from the fact that one nation is as free to compete as another, and each may find grounds for its action. What one may do another may demand the opportunity to rival, and we remain in the thrall of competitive effort.

Those were the principles laid down by the Secretary of State in his address upon which the American delegation acted. We came to the conclusion very early that in order to bring about a thoroughly efficient reduction of armaments we must include France and Italy. During the war neither of those powers had kept up its construction of ships; they had taken all their men and used them in the field and had not expanded their navies at all; yet at the same time they had been two of the great naval powers of the world and still were great maritime powers. So it seemed essential that they should form a part of the association of powers which should join in a naval reduction.

In brief, the plan which we proposed rested upon the general principles which I have stated at some length, and which are as follows:

(1) That all capital-shipbuilding programs, either actual or projected, should be abandoned;
(2) That further reduction should be made through the scrapping of certain of the older ships;
(3) That in general regard should be had to the existing naval strength of the powers concerned;
(4) That the capital ship tonnage should be used as the measurement of strength for navies and a proportionate allowance of auxiliary combatant craft prescribed.

Then followed the details of the American proposition, which I shall not repeat here, but which I ask to have printed with my speech at this point. The extract covers all the details of our first proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

More specifically, the plan in relation to capital ships was as follows:

CAPITAL SHIPS.

UNITED STATES.

The United States is now completing its program of 1916 calling for 10 new battleships and 6 battle cruisers. One battleship has been completed. The others are in various stages of construction; in some cases from 60 to over 80 per cent of the construction has been done. On these 15 capital ships now being built over $330,000,000 have been spent. Still, the United States is willing in the interest of an immediate limitation of naval armament to scrap all these ships.

The United States proposes, if this plan is accepted—

(1) To scrap all capital ships now under construction. This includes 6 battle cruisers and 7 battleships on the ways and in course of building, and 2 battleships launched.

The total number of new capital ships thus to be scrapped is 15. The total tonnage of the new capital ships when completed would be 618,000 tons.

(2) To scrap all of the older battleships up to, but not including, the Delaware and North Dakota. The number of these old battleships to be scrapped is 15. Their total tonnage is 227,740 tons.

Thus the number of capital ships to be scrapped by the United States, if this plan is accepted, is 30, with an aggregate tonnage (including that of ships in construction, if completed) of 845,740 tons.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The plan contemplates that Great Britain and Japan shall take action which is fairly commensurate with this action on the part of the United States.

It is proposed that Great Britain—

(1) Shall stop further construction of the four new Hoods, the new capital ships not laid down but upon which money has been spent. These four ships, if completed, would have tonnage displacement of 172,000 tons.

(2) Shall, in addition, scrap her predreadnoughts, second-line battleships, and first-line battleships up to, but not including, the King George V class.

These, with certain predreadnoughts which it is understood have already been scrapped, would amount to 19 capital ships and a tonnage reduction of 411,375 tons.

The total tonnage of ships thus to be scrapped by Great Britain (including the tonnage of the four Hoods, if completed) would be 583,375 tons.

JAPAN.

It is proposed that Japan—

(1) Shall abandon her program of ships not yet laid down, viz, the Kii, Owari, No. 7, and No. 8 battleships, and Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 8, battle cruisers.

It should be observed that this does not involve the stopping of construction, as the construction of none of these ships has been begun.

(2) Shall scrap three capital ships (the Mutsu, launched, the Tosa and Kago, in course of building) and four battle cruisers (the Amagi and Akagi, in course of building, and the Atoga and Takao, not yet laid down, but for which certain material has been assembled).

The total number of new capital ships to be scrapped under this paragraph is seven. The total tonnage of these new capital ships when completed would be 289,100 tons.

(3) Shall scrap all predreadnoughts and battleships of the second line. This would include the scrapping of all ships up to, but not including, the Settsu; that is, the scrapping of 10 older ships, with a total tonnage of 159,828 tons.

The total reduction of tonnage on vessels existing, laid down, or for which material has been assembled (taking the tonnage of the new ships when completed), would be 448,928 tons.

Thus, under this plan there would be immediately destroyed, of the navies of the three powers, 66 capital fighting ships, built and building, with a total tonnage of 1,878,043.

It is proposed that it should be agreed by the United States, Great Britain, and Japan that their navies, with respect to capital ships, within three months after the making of the agreement, shall consist of certain ships designated in the proposal and numbering for the United States 18, for Great Britain 22, for Japan 10.

The tonnage of these ships would be as follows: Of the United States, 500,650; of Great Britain, 604,450; of Japan, 299,700. In reaching this result, the age factor in the case of the respective navies has received appropriate consideration.

Replacement:

With respect to replacement, the United States proposes:

(1) That it be agreed that the first replacement tonnage shall not be laid down until 10 years from the date of the agreement.

(2) That replacement be limited by an agreed maximum of capital-ship tonnage as follows:

	Tons.
For the United States	500,000
For Great Britain	500,000
For Japan	300,000

(3) That subject to the 10-year limitation above fixed and the maximum standard, capital ships may be replaced when they are 20 years old by new capital-ship construction.

(4) That no capital ship shall be built in replacement with a tonnage displacement of more than 35,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. I should say that it was very clear to the American delegation, and they stood firmly on that point, that the only basis for starting the limitation of navies must be the naval armament which actually existed; in other words, that the existing ratios between the different fleets were the only ground on which we could begin the reduction of armament. The moment we left that ground and got into the very cloudy region of each country's deciding what its peace and safety and security demanded, there would be no standard and we could get nowhere. We therefore took as the basis from which to start the existing ratios between the three great fleets. The ratio at which we aimed, over which there was much contest, however, was, roughly, the well-known 5-5-3, that is, 5 for Great Britain, 5 for the United States, and 3 for Japan.

In the statement in reference to replacement there was an agreed maximum of tonnage of capital ships for the United States 500,000 tons, for Great Britain 500,000 tons, and for Japan 300,000 tons.

I shall not go into the proposal in detail, for it is all set down here with all the figures and with the ships which were originally included.

The most serious controversy which arose over this treaty grew out of the question of the ratio. Japan yielded to it finally only with the greatest reluctance and only on account of the willingness of the other Pacific powers to put a limitation on fortifications, a question to which I will come later.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I should make an inquiry there?

Mr. LODGE. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that in the establishment of the ratio full justice was done to France and Italy? I have in mind the fact that during the war they suffered very great losses in their capital ships, and it occurred to me that an injustice was done particularly to France.

Mr. LODGE. On the contrary we gave them much more than the ratio prevailing at that time would have allowed them.

Mr. KING. I agree that that is true.

Mr. LODGE. Under the ratio which we adopted for Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, France would have been entitled to only 130,000 tons, but we agreed that she should have 175,000 tons at once.

Mr. KING. Yes; I appreciate that fact; but it seemed to me that the conference did not quite take into account the losses in capital ships which France and Italy had sustained.

Mr. LODGE. Those losses were not severe, compared with those of England; and we lost practically nothing.

Mr. KING. Yes; it occurs to me that, if we take the existing ratio as the basis, the United States, perhaps, and Japan are at an advantage over Great Britain.

Mr. LODGE. Let me say here—it is a point which, perhaps, may not have occurred to the Senator—that as the fleets stood on November 12 we had four capital ships to one for France, while after this treaty goes into force we shall have two battleships to one for France; that is, we give her a very much better relation—and what is true of us is true of Great Britain and Japan—we give her a very much better relation to the navies of the world than she had before; that is, by reducing our Navy we leave her in a much better relative position.

Another difficulty which occurred and which led to very long discussion was in regard to the Mutsu, a Japanese ship which had just been completed and commissioned, a ship of 33,600 tons, and, of course, of the post-Jutland type. That ship had been largely built by popular subscription, and there was naturally a very strong feeling about it in Japan, just as there would have been in this country if we had a ship that had been built by popular subscription. The Japanese were very insistent on the retention of the Mutsu, and they offered, if they were allowed to retain it—and it was on the list to be destroyed in our plan—that they would scrap the Settsu, which would slightly increase their total tonnage, and that we should have the right to scrap the Delaware and North Dakota, which are our two oldest ships.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oldest dreadnoughts?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; our oldest dreadnoughts—I am speaking always of capital ships—our oldest capital ships, and replace them with two ships of the West Virginia class, of the most modern post-Jutland type. Great Britain likewise was to have the right to build two new Hoods on destroying four ships—the Thunderer, the King George V, the Ajax, and the Centurion.

That arrangement was finally accepted; but meantime we had made the agreement to which I have already alluded, that no capital ships should be over 35,000 tons and no guns of a greater caliber than 16 inches should be used.

Great Britain had four new Hoods designed, had begun to assemble the materials, and had already spent, I think, about fifteen or sixteen million dollars, but the ships had not really been begun. Those ships were planned and designed to be 49,000 tons, but Great Britain accepted the limitation of 35,000 tons. That illustrates the importance of the limitation of tonnage, because if Great Britain had gone on and built those 49,000-ton ships we should have probably have gone on to compete, and Japan, too, and in such competition lies the worst feature of naval armaments. So that agreement was made.

In the case of the United States it was proposed to scrap all capital ships now under construction—that is to say, 15 ships in various stages of construction. Instead, 13 of these ships are to be scrapped or disposed of. The total number of capital ships which were to be scrapped by the United States, or disposed of, was stated to be 30. Under the treaty the number is 28, with a very slight difference in total tonnage.

In the case of Great Britain the construction of the four great Hoods has been abandoned, and while Great Britain is to have two new ships, limited to 35,000 tons each, four of the retained ships are to be scrapped, as already stated, when these two ships are completed.

It was also provided in the original proposal that Great Britain should scrap her predreadnoughts, second-line battleships, and first-line battleships up to and not including the King George V. These ships, with certain predreadnoughts which it was understood had already been scrapped, would amount to 19 capital ships, with a tonnage reduction on this account of 411,375 tons. This provision is substantially unaffected by the treaty, the fact being that under the treaty 20 ships are to be scrapped instead of 19 that were mentioned in the proposal.

Under the treaty Japan is to scrap all of the ships mentioned, with the exception of the Mutsu. They are all listed in the tables in the second part of the treaty. Japan also—shall scrap all predreadnoughts and battleships of the second line. This would include the scrapping of all snips up to but not including the Settsu; that is, the scrapping of 10 older ships, with a total tonnage of 159,828 tons.

Under the treaty 10 ships are scrapped, including the Settsu, instead of excluding it.

The rules for scrapping vessels of war are set forth in the treaty, and I do not think it necessary for me to repeat them at this time. I think Senators who will take the trouble to examine the rules for scrapping vessels of war will find them extremely thorough and effective.

The size of each capital ship, as I have said, is limited to 35,000 tons. It is also provided that no capital ship shall carry a gun of a caliber in excess of 16 inches. Provisions for replacement of capital ships are all set forth in the tables which have been read here, which form section 2 of part 3 of chapter 2 of the treaty; and those tables give all the times of replacement and laying down, the age of the ships, and everything else. I printed the speed tables in the RECORD of March 10, 1922.

The treaty also deals with aircraft carriers, and the delegates finally agreed on a total tonnage for aircraft carriers as follows:

The United States, 135,000 tons.
The British Empire, 135,000 tons.
France, 60,000 tons.
Italy, 60,000 tons.
Japan, 81,000 tons.

The United States would have been ready to agree on a lower limit, but the other powers insisted on the one which I have read.

We have also limited the aircraft carriers to 27,000 tons, another very important limitation, but we make an exception for the United States, that the United States can take two of the uncompleted battle cruisers—the highest, I think, is 33 per cent completed—although they are 33,000-ton ships, and use them for two airplane carriers. That is a very important arrangement for the United States, because airplane carriers we must have. They probably are more important to the safety of the Navy just now than any other form of craft, and we have none. In fact, none of the powers have any except Great Britain, and hers are experimental, and she will probably have to replace them. This gives us an opportunity to use two of our battle cruisers partially completed, and, it was estimated, would make a saving of $15,000,000 over two new aircraft carriers.

Before going on to some of the less important provisions, I must say a word about submarines.

We were very anxious to limit submarines. Great Britain was anxious to have submarines entirely prohibited. To that none of the other powers were ready to agree. We proposed a limitation of 60,000 tons. I should say that the United States had more submarines than any other nation which was a member of the conference. We had 95,000 tons. Great Britain had about 83,000 tons. We offered a limitation of 60,000 tons for the highest—Great Britain and the United States. France declined to accept any limitation. She said it would be incompatible with her safety. As I have said, as the conference required unanimity, no limitation could be put upon the number of submarines to be built by any one of the powers, and, of course, if no limitation was put on submarines and all the powers could build as many as they chose, it necessarily followed that the vessels used for defense against submarines could not be limited either. If we had unlimited submarine building permitted, we had to have unlimited defense against submarines. That meant that there would be no limitation put on what are commonly called scout cruisers, no limitation on destroyers, in which branch we were immensely superior to all the other powers, and no limitation on submarine chasers, the small boats used for that purpose.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. GERRY. Was not a limitation put on the use of submarines in the treaty dealing with submarines and noxious gases?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; there was a limitation, which I hope will be of some value, which limits them under the provisions of international law and provides that for a breach of those provisions, whether the captain does it by governmental orders or not, other nations are entitled to treat him as a pirate.

Mr. GERRY. What I refer to in that treaty is, if I am not interrupting the Senator's argument, that article 1 and article 4 seem to me to be contradictory.

Mr. LODGE. They are not. I will tell the Senator just what they are. Article 1 states existing international law.

Mr. GERRY. That is what I understood.

Mr. LODGE. Article 4 is new. Article 4 states something which is not international law now. We first made them subject to the present international law, to which, as the Senator well knows, they were not subject during the war. Of course, this applies only to attacks on merchant vessels. No limitation is put on the use of the submarine as against a warship.

Mr. GERRY. It applies to visit and search, does it not?

Mr. LODGE. It applies to mercantile ships entirely.

Mr. GERRY. It applies to the right of visit and search?

Mr. LODGE. That is one thing; yes. Article 4 goes further.

Mr. GERRY. In other words, article 4 explains article 1, if I understand the Senator, by going further?

Mr. LODGE. No. Article 1 is simply the statement of existing law as applicable to submarines.

Mr. GERRY. And then article 4 changes existing law and practically nullifies article 1. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LODGE. No; it does not nullify it at all. That is why they are both put in.

Mr. GERRY. Article 1 simply restates international law?

Mr. LODGE. It declares the rules of civilized nations—that is, existing international law—in regard to the use of submarines against merchant ships, which were not observed during the last war. Then we say:

Belligerent submarines are not under any circumstances exempt from the universal rules above stated—

And we invite all other civilized powers to express their assent. Then article 3 makes the breaking of those rules an act of piracy. Then they go on to say in article 4:

The signatory powers recognize the practical impossibility of using submarines as commerce destroyers without violating, as they were violated in the recent war of 1914–1918, the requirements universally accepted by civilized nations for the protection of the lives of neutrals and noncombatants, and to the end that the prohibition of the use of submarines as commerce destroyers shall be universally accepted as a part of the law of nations they now accept that prohibition as henceforth binding as between themselves and they invite all other nations to adhere thereto.

There was no prohibition before; there was nothing in international law which prevented their use.

Mr. GERRY. May I ask the Senator whether our naval officers contend that submarines can not be used for the purpose of visit and search according to international law?

Mr. LODGE. Of course they do not, if they visit and search. This is simply applying to the submarine the rules of international law, which include visit and search.

Mr. GERRY. Exactly; but article 4, as I understand it——

Mr. LODGE. Article 4 is a prohibition without any regard to visit and search.

Mr. GERRY. Then, under article 4 the submarine can not be used for visit and search?

Mr. LODGE. That is the new proposition; that it shall not be used at all against merchant vessels as a commerce destroyer.

Mr. GERRY. And the statement is made that it is impossible to use submarines in that way without breaking international law.

Mr. LODGE. It probably is impossible, as a matter of fact, to use them for commerce destruction without their breaking existing rules of law.

Mr. GERRY. I understand that a great many of our naval officers do not agree to that contention.

Mr. LODGE. I dare say that is true. If the Senator can find anything that all naval officers agree to, I shall be very much obliged to him if he will state it. I did not mean, however, to get off on the question of international law. That will come up later.

Mr. GERRY. Then the submarine is absolutely limited under the——

Mr. LODGE. The submarine is prohibited as a commerce destroyer, if we can get them to agree to it.

Mr. GERRY. Then there is a limitation on the submarine besides that contained in the treaty under consideration?

Mr. LODGE. There is a limitation on the use of the submarine, but not a limitation on the construction of submarines. To return to that, although we can not put a limitation on the number of scout cruisers, destroyers, or submarine chasers that could be built, we could put the same limitations that we put on the capital ships as to the tonnage and the caliber of guns, and those were put in. There was a limitation on the guns that could be carried by an airplane carrier; that is, if it has guns exceeding 6 inches, the total number of guns shall not exceed 10. It can not carry a gun in excess of 8 inches. It may carry without limit 5-inch guns and antiaircraft guns. With respect to auxiliary craft, the treaty provides that no vessel of war exceeding 10,000 tons, other than capital ships or aircraft carriers, shall be acquired by or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of any of the contracting powers; and then it limits the caliber and the number of guns which cruisers and destroyers can use. Of course, the treaty also provides that none of the contracting powers will by gift, sale, or any mode of transfer turn over any vessel of war in such manner that the vessel may become a vessel of war in the navy of any foreign power; and we put a stop to the building of warships on foreign account.

Mr. President, having gone briefly over the most important parts of the treaty, I am going to take up the speech which was made here by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in regard to this treaty, and correct, as I think, some of the mistakes in it.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. GERRY. Is the Senator going to discuss how replacements of capital ships are made?

Mr. LODGE. That is all set forth in the treaty. What can I tell the Senator about it?

Mr. GERRY. I did not know whether or not the Senator was going to try to explain these tables any more fully than they are set forth. They seem rather complicated.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will look at one of the tables, he will see that we give first the ships scrapped, taking our own list, with the ages of the vessels scrapped in parentheses. The number in brackets behind each ship means the age of the ship. Where it is a zero, it means that it is a ship not yet complete; that is, that it is still in process of building. Then, when we come to retained ships, the Senator will find after each ship its age and when that ship can be replaced, which is covered by the capital letters in the first two columns, "Ships laid down" and "Ships completed," and then the ships retained; and Senators will see by following it down that the number of pre-Jutland ships retained entirely disappears, and the post-Jutland ships become the whole 15, as we gradually get rid of the older ships and replace them with new ones.

The replacement rules are laid down on page 19 of the treaty:

> Capital ships and aircraft carriers 20 years after the date of their completion may, except as otherwise provided in article 8 and in the tables in section 2 of this part, be replaced by new construction, but within the limits prescribed in article 4 and article 7. The keels of such new construction may, except as otherwise provided in article 8 and in the tables in section 2 of this part, be laid down not earlier than 17 years from the date of completion of the tonnage to be replaced, provided, however, that no capital ship tonnage, with the exception of the ships referred to in the third paragraph of article 2—

Those are the excepted ships—> and the replacement tonnage specifically mentioned in section 2 of this part, shall not be laid down until 10 years from November 12, 1921.

Then follow the provisions for carrying out the replacements; and in the tables, if the Senator will examine them, he will see the ages and the dates of replacement for all.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say something with regard to the speech made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] upon this naval treaty.

The Senator from Missouri, in his speech of March 16, spoke as follows:

> Mr. President, I desire to lay before the Senate, in connection with the treaties now under consideration, some facts which have not heretofore been discussed, and which, while they bear upon the disarmament treaty directly, have also a very important bearing on the treaty under consideration—

That was the four-power treaty—

> I propose to place before the Senate some figures with reference to the relative strength of the navies provided for in the naval treaty; and I believe I can say as a preliminary that the whole status has been misrepresented to the Senate and to the American people.

As I was one of those who made that representation, I take the liberty of saying that the status was not misrepresented. We have told the American people exactly what the facts were. Of course, errors are possible to all, but I think I shall show that the errors were not with us.

I continue to quote:

> The facts I am about to present are the work of naval experts of a high order, and are buttressed by documentary proof which demands, in my opinion, the attention of this body. If they are not given attention before the four-power treaty is acted upon, we will have so far committed ourselves that probably nothing we can do will extricate us from a dilemma which is fraught, in my judgment, with the very gravest danger.
> I want a disarmament treaty made which will reduce to the minimum the armaments of all the nations of the world. I want that treaty so made that the United States will be safe and not placed at a disadvantage, and I am imploring the Senators who now pay me the compliment of their attention, and those who have been called away by other business, to study these figures, which I believe in every singular particular to be accurate, for I have taken pains to have them checked by two experts, who know their business if any two men in the United States know the business of comparing naval armaments and the speed and quality of ships.

These experts are anonymous. Those that we have called in, as I have said, are officers of the highest experience and best known in the Navy, and their names are there, and they are responsible.

The Senator from Missouri, I think, has not been very fortunate in choosing his advisers. The "two experts, who know their business if any two men in the United States know the business of comparing naval armaments and the speed and quality of ships" have not done their duty well. They have indulged in inaccuracies, omissions, and wrong conclusions, many of which seem so evident as to create surprise.

I will treat first of the inaccuracies. The Senator states that the Kurama, the Ibuki, and the Ikoma, until now, have been classed merely as first-class cruisers, and he cites as his authority "Jaynes Fighting Ships." On the contrary, in "Jaynes Fighting Ships" of 1920, the Kurama, the Ibuki, and the Ikoma are classed as Japanese battle cruisers. They carry four 12-inch guns and eight 8-inch guns in their main batteries. It is entirely inaccurate to class them as first-class cruisers. They are not so classed by any naval authority, including the Japanese themselves. It is apparent on the face of the matter that they are not.

In the case of the computation of tonnage to be scrapped, the United States, in the Senator's speech, is stated to have scrapped 762,940 tons; Great Britain, 92,000 tons; and Japan, 289,182 tons. Whatever the source from which these figures are derived, they are absolutely inaccurate as a computation of tonnage of fighting ships to be actually scrapped by the powers above mentioned.

The tonnage scrapped by the United States standard of measurement, under the American proposal, was as follows:

	Tons.
United States	845,740
Great Britain	583,375
Japan	448,928

When the Mutsu was taken in and the Setsu scrapped, and when two ships are reserved as aircraft carriers out of the scrapped tonnage, and when the West Virginia and the Colorado are taken in and the North Dakota and Delaware scrapped, and the 2 aircraft carriers reserved out of the 13 remaining new ships to be scrapped, and when the 4 of the King George type are scrapped, and the 2 new Hoods added, and the 2 new aircraft carriers reserved for Great Britain, the revised figures would be as follows:

	Tons.
United States	733,540
Great Britain	507,225
Japan	350,528

These figures—which are authentic, I am sure, which are furnished me by the experts of the Navy Department whom I have mentioned, who advised us through the conference—are entirely at variance with those submitted by the Senator from Missouri. Who could have told him that Great Britain scrapped only 92,000 tons, I can not imagine. She had scrapped a great many pre-Jutland ships, old ships, before she came here, and yet she scrapped much more than 92,000 tons.

Again the Senator from Missouri, in his speech, said that $650,000,000 had been spent already on the construction of new ships that are to be scrapped. That again is wrong. The original American proposal contemplated the scrapping of all the capital ships in the 1916 program which were not in commission, on which approximately $332,000,000 had been spent or obligated. There is no mistake about that. These are based on the Treasury and the drafts of the contracts establishing the obligations. That is all documentary.

In the final treaty as agreed to by the delegates, however, the battleships West Virginia and Colorado were reserved, and two of the battle cruisers kept for conversion to aircraft carriers. Subtracting the moneys involved in this matter from the original total, we have approximately $242,000,000, or considerably less than half the amount stated by the Senator from Missouri in his speech.

In submitting his table of ships to be retained the Senator from Missouri credits Great Britain with two super-Hoods, carrying each twelve 16-inch guns, and throwing a weight of metal of 25,000 tons each. I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the two new Hoods are not "super-Hoods." The super-Hood was a ship planned by Great Britain, which would have had a displacement of approximately 50,000 tons. That ship might carry twelve 16-inch guns, but the greatest number of guns, according to the statement of the British experts, that the two new Hoods can carry is nine each. Indeed, there are many of the British experts who do not even believe that this reduced number of 16-inch guns can be put on the 35,000-ton ships, because we have reduced, as I have already said, the limit of tonnage to 35,000 tons and the British were planning 49,000-ton vessels, so evidently the Senator's experts have not noticed that limitation in the treaty. Furthermore, Great Britain has no 16-inch guns at present, and she will be forced to develop this caliber or else to content herself with placing on the new Hoods 15-inch guns.

The Senator from Missouri makes the accusation in his speech that the difference in method of computing tonnage in existence in the various nations before the war has not been taken into account, and in this connection makes the following statement:

> In order, therefore, to compare the tonnage of American ships as given in the table above with British ships as given in the table, we must add one-eighth, or 12½ per cent, to the British tonnage.
> Accordingly the British tonnage allowed by the treaty as to existing ships will be 628,820, as against 525,850, a difference of 20 per cent in favor of Great Britain.

Now, to assume that the experts of the Navy Department who advised the delegates were so colossally ignorant that they did not know the difference existing between the American tonnage, the Japanese tonnage, which is very like the American tonnage, and the British measurements, which are known as the legend tonnage, would be to assume a degree of ignorance which is impossible. They were perfectly familiar with it, and the figures were based, of course, on the American tonnage throughout in making our comparison. Subsequently the nations agreed on an international ratio and also on the metric tonnage, which appears throughout the treaty, and all reductions are made on the international tons.

Then the Senator from Missouri goes on to say:

> That fact has been concealed from the American people, whether designedly or stupidly, I do not know. I charge it to be a fact, and I charge it to be a fact of unspeakable perfidy, to thus deceive the American people and the American Congress.

This is strong language. Anyone using it should be absolutely sure of the ground on which he is standing. Unfortunately the Senator from Missouri again has evidently placed too much reliance on his "two experts."

To begin with, far from omitting to consider the different methods of measuring tonnage in existence in Great Britain, Japan, and the United States, they were all considered before the original American proposal, submitted to the conference on the opening day, was prepared, as every member of the delegation and all the experts know. In making the estimates of naval tonnage before the conference convened, for the purpose of arriving at a just estimate of strength, every British ship and every Japanese ship was reduced to the American standard tonnage, and the comparisons made on that basis.

Reduced to standard American tons, the present capital-ship tonnage retained by the United States, Great Britain, and Japan will be as follows:

	Tons.
The United States	500, 650
Great Britain	604, 450
Japan	313, 300

When the West Virginia and Colorado are included in the American table and the North Dakota and Delaware scrapped, and when the two new Hoods of 35,000 tons each are added to the British list, and the King George, Ajax, Centurion, and Thunderer are taken away, the capital-ship tonnage will be as follows, according to the American standard of measurement:

	Tons.
The United States	525, 850
Great Britain	578, 600
Japan	313, 300

To put it mildly, there is some difference between these figures and the ones given by the Senator from Missouri, which read as follows:

	Tons.
The United States	525, 850
Great Britain	628, 820
Japan	383, 985

So much for some of the inaccuracies furnished to the Senator from Missouri. An omission, however, is equally as important as an inaccuracy. Indeed, often it is more so. Let us, therefore, look over the Senator's speech for omissions. To begin with, the Senator from Missouri in enumerating the ships to be scrapped by the various powers says, in his paragraph on the United States ships, that "one battleship, the West Virginia, has already been launched." In no place in his enumeration of the ships to be scrapped by Japan does he mention that two of their ships have already been launched.

At no place in his speech does a statement appear to the effect that the average armor of the battleships classed in the list of the United States is 14½ inches as against 12½ inches for Great Britain and against less than 11 inches for Japanese ships.

Again, the fact is not mentioned that the total number of guns listed in the United States' list of ships total some 192 as against 166 for the British Navy and 96 for Japan, and that therefore the rapidity of fire is very much greater for the ships of the United States Navy.

Again, the fact is not mentioned that the 16-inch gun with which the United States is credited has something over 98,000 tons of muzzle energy as against 84,000 tons of muzzle energy for the 15-inch guns. Nor is it noted that the 14-inch guns with which seven of our ships are armed are 50-caliber guns as compared with 42-caliber 15-inch guns and 13½-inch 45-caliber guns carried by the British Navy. With the above facts in mind, the conclusions of the Senator from Missouri as to strength are entirely changed, for the ordnance and armor of the battleships of the United States may be said to be equal or superior to the ordnance and armor of the battleships of Great Britain and greatly superior to that of the Japanese ships.

Furthermore, there is one very important matter omitted entirely from the comparison made by the Senator from Missouri. This is the age factor. Glance at the table of ships. It will be seen that the United States had eight ships finished in 1917 or later, whereas Great Britain, with her two new Hoods completed, will only have four ships finished in the corresponding period. Though the United States has certain vessels that are older than those retained on the British list, this age factor greatly strengthens our Navy by comparison. The Senator from Missouri states:

> It would be interesting to know why Great Britain is credited with scrapping 24 capital ships, 20 of which are obsolete, offered for sale, and, in fact, already scrapped, and why Japan is credited with scrapping 3 capital ships which are not actually capital ships. Is it merely an attempt to pad the lists in order to make a presentable appearance against that of the United States?

Again the Senator's experts are at fault. All of the 20 ships which he speaks of as obsolete and offered for sale are classed in the dreadnought type, and all but three are of the same or later date than our two vessels, the North Dakota and Delaware, which will only go out when the Colorado and West Virginia are completed to take their places. The remaining three are dreadnaughts completed in 1909 and therefore less than 13 years of age. Also, the three ships of the Japanese Navy, the Kurama, Ibuki, and Ikoma, are capital ships built in 1907 and are less than 20 years of age, which is the age when ships retire from active service and are placed on the obsolete list.

In this connection it might be well to enumerate the figures of present strength as estimated by the official authorities of the Navy Department in an effort to compute the relative strength by tonnage. In making this estimate the Navy Department considered only dreadnoughts and the percentage of completion of the various ships under construction. This was the basis for the American proposal and it is the basis upon which the final treaty was concluded.

Countries.	Dreadnoughts actually constructed.	Ships under construction, percentage of completion.	Total.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
United States	500,650	346,374	847,024
Great Britain	1,015,825	(1)	1,015,825
Japan	334,700	83,330	418,030

[1] No credit.

The Senator from Missouri has dealt in like measure with auxiliary tonnage of the various nations. In this connection the first thought that comes to anyone's mind is that no country is limited numerically in the amount of auxiliary tonnage that it may build, with the exception of the aircraft carrier.

In the enumeration of the auxiliary tonnage certain startling and significant omissions are made by the Senator from Missouri.

We are unquestionably behind Great Britain in the light cruiser type. However, if the United States will build, she has a right to do so. We have 10 scout cruisers now under construction and nearly completed. Let us glance over the tables which the Senator has submitted. It will be noted from them that the United States has 26 cruisers and Great Britain 70, including those which the dominions possess. The Senator, however, has entirely omitted to mention the fact that the United States has 316 modern destroyers, Great Britain has 20 flotilla leaders and 191 destroyers, or a total of 211, and Japan has only 69 destroyers. At present, therefore, the United States has 105 destroyers more than Great Britain and 247 more than Japan. Our destroyers are the most modern boats of the very finest type. There are no such destroyers afloat anywhere else. They are very large destroyers, of 1,100 tons. It is remarkable that the two experts should have permitted the Senator from Missouri to leave out such an important item.

The Senator from Missouri in his tables has made no mention of the submarines which the three powers possess. Had a summary of the submarine strength been made, it would have been seen again that the United States' position is strong. The present submarine strength of the three powers concerned is as follows:

Countries.	Submarines.	Tonnage.
		Tons.
United States (approximately)	130	87,000
Great Britain	100	82,000
Japan	51	36,800

In other words, we have 5,000 tons more of submarines than Great Britain, and 50,000 more than Japan. Again, it is remarkable that the two experts on whom the Senator from Missouri has been relying have failed to note this very significant fact.

So much for the omissions, and the Senate will note, to say the least, that they are important. Now, for certain conclusions.

In the interesting deductions which have been drawn by the Senator from Missouri in the matters of speed and battle strategy and tactics, particularly with regard to the matter of speed, he has not mentioned the fact that the speed of the main fighting fleet is the speed of the slowest ship composing that fleet. It will be noted that eight of the British ships are rated at 21 knots speed, and that therefore while the Queen Elizabeth type have 25 knots speed, yet to maintain their position in the line the speed of 21 knots, which is the speed of the American fleet, can not be exceeded. The point, therefore, made by the Senator from Missouri in the matter of speed with reference to the fighting ships has very little value.

Now let us look into this matter which the Senator from Missouri has dwelt upon at great length, namely, the question of battle cruisers. The general board of the Navy is composed entirely of naval experts whose whole duty it is to consider tactics and strategy. The question was put to them as to whether it would be wise for the United States, with a navy reduced to 18 capital ships, to retain battle cruisers or to have these ships all battleships. They returned a report which was unanimous to the effect that the battleships should be retained and the battle cruisers excluded. Both the British naval experts and the Japanese naval experts are of the same opinion and with the ratification of the naval treaty the death knell of the present battle cruiser will be sounded. Every country when limited to a specific number of capital ships will desire to have these ships as powerful as possible, for the final decision in a war is obtained in the great battle when strength meets strength.

The foremost British naval experts, those who have commanded the battle cruisers in action, have stated that by theorists on shore speed was often substituted for strength in armament, but that they who had fought in the vessels concerned felt differently in the matter.

It would be interesting to ask the two experts on whom the Senator from Missouri has based his dependence what they would do if the battle cruisers of either Great Britain or Japan clashed with the American fleet. Would they send them on the high seas to raid commerce or would they keep them with the fleet? If they sent them on commerce raiding expeditions, the main fighting fleet on the day of battle would be weakened by their absence. If they retained them with the main fleet, they would be of a type of ship almost too weak to lie in the line, for they have not the same fighting value as the battleship. Indeed, the present battle cruiser is but a luxury and can only be indulged in when the main line has been made secure. Therefore when navies are limited it will pass out of existence.

The Senator from Missouri in his speech said:

> It is true, however, that while the conference was in progress Japan by rush work laid down the keels of two of the battleships. This was so manifestly a threat as to require no comment.

In this connection I should like to point out to the Senate that Japan, like the other countries concerned, merely continued, and quite properly continued, her program until conclusions had been reached. There was no more threat in laying the keels of these two battleships than there was in the fact that we launched the West Virginia on the 17th of November, one week after the opening of the conference.

The Senator asks in one place, "What do we get from this treaty?" And by "this treaty" he refers to the four-power treaty. In reply let me quote from a report submitted by the General Board of the Navy on matters pertaining to the conference.

> If the Anglo-Japanese alliance is to be continued, the minimum strength that the United States can safely accept for its Navy is equality with that of the two nations combined. This means a two-power standard and a Navy the greatest in the world. No interpretative declarations by either or both of the countries can be as satisfying to the United States as the noncontinuance of the alliance.

This is a deliberate expression of the constituted board of naval experts as to the bearing of the Anglo-Japanese alliance and the strength of the Navy necessary to carry out our policies. The four-power treaty through the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance has made the naval treaty possible and also the continuance of the 5-5-3 ratio.

The Senator from Missouri laid great stress upon article 19, in which we agree to preserve the status quo in certain of the Pacific islands in our possession. In reaching this conclusion the United States representatives were guided by the underlying axiom which they had taken as their thesis during the conference, namely, defense should be amply guarded; offense disregarded. Therefore, agreements to discontinue the expansion of fortifications at points where the offensive element predominated were reached.

There are also certain fallacies in the statement of the Senator from Missouri. To begin with, Wake Island is impossible to fortify. Next, Guam could not be made a great fleet base without a vast expenditure of money, because it is too small.

Let me digress here to say that I have been a good deal amused at the agony of apprehension which some persons have expressed in regard to Guam. We took that island in the Spanish-American War; it was taken by the cruiser Charleston. We have had so little interest in the island that we have never passed a line of legislation in regard to it or to provide for its government or to make any provision about it at all. It has been left in the hands of the Navy, which captured it. The captain of the ship represents the capitors and rules the island. That shows the amount of interest we have taken in Guam. We have never fortified it, and nobody would vote to spend money in fortifying it. All we provide in this treaty is that we will not fortify so long as Japan does not fortify her islands.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Those who at present are talking about fortifications at Guam are amongst the Senators who never have supported an appropriation of money in a sum sufficient to build even a naval base at San Francisco.

Mr. LODGE. That is quite true. The Senator from Missouri has made no mention of the fact that we hold Hawaii and that the Japanese have given up the right to fortify the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Loochoo Islands, the Pescadores, and Formosa, without asking to reserve for themselves any position similar to that which we hold in Hawaii.

Those Japanese islands are the ones which threaten the Philippines. Formosa is the nearest one in which fortifications would threaten the Philippines. Of course, no island that Japan has could possibly be made a threat or menace to the United States.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Of course, under the treaties which have been negotiated we practically abandon the Philippine Islands to Japan and Great Britain; that is, in the sense that there will be no defensive or offensive operations on the part of the United States with respect to the Philippine Islands. I am not complaining of that, however.

Mr. LODGE. The Philippines will be in exactly the condition in which they now are and have been ever since they were taken.

Mr. KING. Obviously; and I think we ought to relinquish control of the Philippine Islands at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think that follows. We have more protection for them by the four-power treaty than we have ever had since we have had them.

Mr. KING. Not from the United States, though.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, they are nowhere near the United States.

Mr. KING. No; but there is no protection upon the part of the United States of the Philippine Islands possible under these treaties.

Mr. McCORMICK. The critics of these treaties have never voted any great sums for the protection of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. LODGE. Of course not. We shall never fortify them. It would cost hundreds of millions of dollars to fortify them and probably take half a century to do it. We are not going to do it. Previously, however, we had no promise from anybody to respect the Philippine Islands, but now we have that promise from three great powers. The Senator from Utah may think that worthless, but, nevertheless, it is worth a good deal.

Mr. KING. I am making no complaint about the lack of fortification of the Philippine Islands, and if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] in the two little thrusts which he has just submitted, and which are irrelevant to the question, attempts thereby to criticize Senators with respect to the Philippine Islands, he utterly misconceives their attitude. I know of no Senators who have desired to fortify the Philippine Islands. So far as I am concerned, I think we ought to relinquish control over them at once.

Mr. LODGE. That is a matter of present policy; but we are better protected as to the possession of those islands by the agreement under the four-power treaty than we have ever been before. The Japanese have given up the right to fortify all the islands which would be immediately formidable to the Philippines, and, as I have already said, none of their islands can be made formidable to us. Of course, when we agree not to extend fortifications all such agreements are reciprocal.

Neither has the Senator from Missouri mentioned the fact that in relinquishing the right to fortify the island of Amami-Oshima, which is a very large island, 60 miles long, the Japanese have yielded a position that is so far superior to any that we have given up that it is hardly to be mentioned in the same category. I state these points merely to show the just and fair spirit with which each nation approached these agreements, and, further, to make definitely clear that the United States were not yielding without a corresponding sacrifice on the other side.

The Senator from Missouri says there is not a single gateway in the waters of the seven seas that is not controlled by Great Britain. That is a very loose statement. Of course, Great Britain holds many strategical points. Incidentally she has held them for a hundred and fifty years. On the other hand, the large majority of them are in no way fortified in the modern sense of the word. For example, the Senator from Missouri specifically mentions Jamaica as capping one of the entrances to the Panama Canal. That situation has not grown out of any policies advocated by the American delegation at the conference. The fortifications at Kingston, Jamaica, at Bermuda, at Halifax, and all the other points adjacent to the United States are to all intents and purposes nonexistent. They have not been changed or increased for years, and are, therefore, no menace to the United States. They were abandoned by Great Britain as "strong places of arms," as they have been called, and she some time ago withdrew her fleet. They have never been kept up.

The Senator from Missouri draws most disquieting conclusions from figures which he has presented to the Senate. It might be of interest to him, as it will certainly be to the other Members of the Senate, to know exactly what the situation would have been as to the relative strength of the capital ships of the navies of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan had their contemplated building programs been completed. I have as an authority for the figures which I will now state no less a body than the General Board of the Navy. That board of officers has estimated that with our building program of 1916 and the building programs of the other two nations completed, namely, about the year 1928, the relative tonnage of capital ships, excluding predreadnaughts, would be as follows:

United States	100
Great Britain	106
Japan	87

By the treaty we have fixed the relationship:

United States	100
Great Britain	100
Japan	60

Mr. President, we have listened to considerable discussion on naval strategy and tactics in the speech delivered by the Senator from Missouri, but if he can devise any fairer method for estimating naval strengths than the strength of the battle lines on that day when they may meet in conflict, it would be well to have him state it.

The treaty on limitation of naval armaments is based on a fair and just proportion of fighting strength. Perhaps if his naval advisers had advised him more fully they would have shown him that the battle line is composed of three parts, the van, the center, and the rear. We have heard at length arguments which have attempted to show the disadvantage in which the United States has been placed through this treaty which we are called upon to consider. I will ask the Senate to give some slight consideration to the analysis which I am about to present. At present the United States has three post-Jutland ships to Great Britain's one, and will continue this superiority until 1925, when Great Britain, if she lays down two new Hoods, not super-Hoods, will also have three post-Jutland ships.

Even with three post-Jutland ships, if she builds them, Great Britain would only have two with 16-inch guns and one with 15-inch guns, against our three ships with 16-inch guns, or she may have a total of eighteen 16-inch guns and eight 15-inch guns, making twenty-six in all, against our twenty-four 16-inch guns.

At the head or van of the line, which will be maintained by our three post-Jutland ships, we shall have considerable preponderance, especially so as the old Hood is very weakly armored, while our three ships are a heavily armored homogeneous type.

At the rear of the line we shall have four 12-inch 50-caliber gun ships, against four ships of 13½-inch 45-caliber gun ships. Probably Great Britain will have a slight superiority at the rear of the line.

In the center of the line we shall have eleven 14-inch gun ships, carrying a total of eighty-four 14-inch guns of 50 caliber and forty guns of 45 caliber, totaling one hundred and twenty-four guns, against ten ships of Great Britain carying 15-inch 42-caliber guns, with a total number of guns of eighty only. In the center we oppose one hundred and twenty-four guns to Great Britain's eighty. In the center of our fighting line we shall be vastly superior.

In a fight the Renown, Repulse, and Tiger will be in the fast wing and not in the main body, leaving 17 ships of Great Britain against 18 of the United States, with the United States superior at the head of the line, vastly superior in the center, and only somewhat inferior at the tail of the fighting line. Even with the three battle cruisers thrown into the main fight as best they may be, they will not have the fighting strength of any of the dreadnoughts.

As compared to the capital ships of Japan, with their 4 battle cruisers out of 10 capital ships, the fighting strength of the United States is necessarily greatly superior.

Therefore in the effort to come to an equality in fighting strength with Great Britain and to a ratio of five to three with Japan it will be seen that the United States, while endeavoring in every way to preserve these fair ratios, has in no wise allowed her naval strength to be jeopardized. No naval man of standing will say that on the day of battle, which is the day of the crucial test, he would prefer the Navy of Great Britain or the Navy of Japan to that of the United States.

Mr. President, while the opposition in this country has been drawing a very dreadful picture of how much the United States has sacrificed through the conference agreements, I should like to call attention to what the opposition in Japan thinks of the matter.

The Yorodzu of the 4th of February states as follows:

Japan has been conquered by Great Britain and the United States at the conference. The unrest and concern of the people for their safety will increase in the future. We must strive for the construction of a new Japan which may be able to escape the menace of the United States.

Again, the same paper on the 9th of February states as follows:

Why do our delegates at Washington not rebuke the insolence of the United States? Has not the Chinese delegation declared its dissatisfaction with the results of the conference? While Japan has been forced to give up all that she possessed in China except the lease of Port Arthur and Dairen and the South Manchuria Railway and limit even the defenses of a part of her homeland, Britain has acquired the right of control of a railway in China and the United States has increased her exports to China.

All the Japanese must immediately concentrate their efforts on the opposition to the ratification of those treaties made at Washington.

The Hochi on the 10th of February states:

The conference was a great success for Britain and the United States, and President Harding may well congratulate himself for it. For Japan it was a failure, and we can not bring ourselves to be gratified by it.

Japan has sustained such a loss through the conference as she would have suffered had she been defeated in her desperate war with Russia.

The Yomiuri on the 11th of February stated:

Great Britain has been the largest gainer at the conference, cultivating her friendly relation with the United States, substituting the quadruple entente for the Anglo-Japanese alliance without hurting the feelings of Japan, and keeping the naval strength of the United States down to the level of her own. Securing the good will of China by restoring Wei-hai-wei (no longer of value to her).

The United States comes second to Great Britain in point of success. She has secured a 40 per cent naval superiority over Japan, her potential enemy, and regained the good will of China.

France comes third, through securing a voice in Pacific questions vitally affecting her international position.

China is next to France in her attainments. She, aided by the United States and Great Britain, made Japan yield on the Shantung question and compelled the powers to conclude treaties and agreements favorable to her interests. She lost nothing and gained a great deal.

The most miserable is Japan. She has gained a breathing space in naval competition by the enforcement of the naval holiday, and this is a considerable boon to her. But the days of her unrestricted freedom of action are at an end. The California questions are left unsolved, the pressure of foreign capital is on the increase, and the clandestine movements of foreign missionaries in Korea are growing brisker. These factors may cause enmity and hatred between America and Japan in a few years. Our people should carefully gauge the results of the Washington conference.

The Yorodzu of the 15th of February loudly denounces the Government for its ever-yielding policy in connection with the conference. The foreign minister during the interpellations in the Diet stated that in order to insure peace in the Pacific Japan's claims have been abandoned, not only in the naval ratio, which was absolutely essential for national defense, but in the actual issue involved in the fortification of the Pacific and the question of cables in the territory under Japanese mandate.

This paper bitterly declares that the Washington conference has been of success for America, rescuing her from the international isolation threatened because she threw overboard the League of Nations, and enables her to exploit economic resources in the Far East, while the American Continent is under the lock and key of the Monroe doctrine.

The Japan Chronicle of the 15th of February states:

America has killed two birds with one stone, having secured assistance for China and freed herself of the supposed danger of China being controlled by Japan on the other.

Thus America enhances her political and economic position in China. While Britain gained less, she will be enabled to maintain her old position in China.

Japan's gain is limited to being freed of suspicion and misunderstandings by other nations and having the way paved to some extent for minimizing the estrangement between China and herself.

The two pictures thus presented by the opposition, one in the United States and the other in Japan, are so diametrically opposed to each other that it is difficult to reconcile them. The basis of the estimates are the same, for the treaties which serve us serve Great Britain and Japan as well, and the figures submitted by the Senator from Missouri, in so far as they are accurate, are available alike to those countries.

Mr. President, having read those statements of the Japanese opposition, and having been privileged to hear for some weeks past the views of the opposition in this country, I remembered a similar case, because I once made something of a study of one of the men concerned in it. It was in 1842. The Webster-Ashburton treaty had been made by Mr. Webster, as Secretary of State, and Lord Ashburton, sent out here by Great Britain. The treaty was taken up in the Senate. They discussed it in secret session, but Mr. Benton subsequently published his memoirs and recollections of 30 years; there was not much secrecy left after that and undoubtedly things were given out. I am quoting, because it is a convenient condensation, from Mr. George Ticknor Curtis's Life of Daniel Webster. He speaks first of Mr. Rives, of Virginia, who favored the treaty. Then this which follows sounds so familiar:

Mr. Benton made an elaborate and violent attack upon every stipulation of the treaty, and every part of the negotiation and correspondence. He condemned them equally for what was done and what was left undone. His principal objections—

These are worth listening to.

His principal objections to the whole transaction were: (1) That there had been but one negotiator, and he from an interested State; (2) that the negotiation was not conducted on a basis of absolute right, but as a matter of bargain and sale; (3 and 4) that no protocols, notes, or minutes of the conferences had been kept, and consequently obscurity rested upon the origin and progress of the different propositions; (5) that the American negotiator had taken upon himself to act for the British envoy, presenting the British claims as American and pressing British arguments upon Maine, "victimizing that deserted and doomed State"; (6) that incongruous matters had been mixed in the same treaty; (7) that ratification had been forestalled by private consultations with Senators; (8 and 9) "the solemn and mysterious humbuggery by which Dr. Franklin had been made to play a part in ravishing this ratification from our alarms and screening the negotiator from responsibility for his gratuitous sacrifices" and the "awful apparition of the disinterred map," shown to alarm Senators into ratification. He discussed all these general obections at length and took up all the different parts of the negotiation in detail and could find no redeeming merit in any of them.

On the boundary question he made out 12 important sacrifices by America to 6 insignificant concessions by the British.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Benton then proceeded to take up and discuss the sins of omission which related to the Columbia River dispute; the subject of impressment; the outrage on the Caroline; and the liberation of American slaves, all of which, he said, ought to have been put finally at rest, and in each case according to the extreme claims of the Americans. He condemned Mr. Webster in unmeasured terms for not taking a high and unyielding tone on all these matters and insisting on a final settlement. He was peculiarly severe on the correspondence in the Creole case. Mr. Webster, he said, had laid down the law correctly, but it was all talk, nothing was done. Lord Ashburton had engaged only for the suaviter in modo, while the fortiter in re remained as it was. It was "solemn bamboozlement" to repeat this engagement to the Senate and ask them to be satisfied with it. It was "a contrivance suggested by our Secretary to cover his desertion of the South."

The debate went on, some of the Senators spoke for the treaty; Mr. Calhoun stated his reasons for voting to ratify it, and Mr. Buchanan made a long speech in opposition; but when it came to a vote the Senate voted for it—39 to 9.

I took occasion at that time to look up the debates on the English side—I take it now from Mr. Curtis's abstract, because it is easier to find—and examined the view they took. This is the opposition that I read from:

Lord John Russell spoke of the settlement of the boundary. He admitted the importance of a settlement, but was not satisfied with the terms. Lord Ashburton's first dispatch should have been firmly adhered to, but disadvantageous concessions had been in fact made. Mr. Webster was unfair in insisting on the river boundary so strongly and afterwards leaving it. The correspondence, he thought, showed that better terms might have been obtained. Lord Ashburton he considered a bad appointment. His feelings were not earnestly enough enlisted in the colonial interests of Great Britain, and so the hold of the country on those Provinces was endangered.

Then Lord Palmerston, who was the leader of the opposition—

On the 21st of March moved for copies of the instructions given by the Government to the British envoy, and in a speech of more than three hours' length made an elaborate attack on the whole course of the negotiations and the result attained. He gave an account of the difficulty from the treaty of 1783, together with all the negotiations and attempts at settlement which had been made down to the appointment of Lord Ashburton. In speaking of the interpretation of the treaty of 1783, he declared that he believed the red-lined map of which much had been heard, lately found by Mr. Sparks in the Royal Library at Paris, was the one alluded to by Dr. Franklin, as that used by the commissioners, marked with a strong red line following the boundary as laid down by the treaty; and this line, he said, was the boundary which had always been claimed by Great Britain. There was another map, similarly marked, in the State paper office at London. He criticized the appointment of Lord Ashburton on the ground that he was unskilled in diplomacy and inclined to be favorable to the United States. The first blunder of the envoy was in beginning with an ultimatum instead of allowing himself room for concession. He then showed great weakness in receding from his ultimatum and allowing a division of the Madawaska settlement, contrary to the wish of the inhabitants and the right of Great Britain—

And he condemned it very strongly.

There is one other that I noted, because of the man who made it.

Mr. Macaulay—

Afterwards Lord Macaulay—

declared the treaty to be in every way deficient. They had a right to expect that the dignity of the country would be preserved, that the difficulties should be effectually put at rest, and that cordial feelings between the two countries should have been the result. But, he said, the honor of the country had been compromised by the "humble, caressing, wheedling tone" which Lord Ashburton had adopted, and which contrasted strongly with the "firm, resolute, vigilant, and unyielding" manner of Mr. Webster.

Not at all like Benton's description.

They did not, of course, have to ratify the treaty in Parliament; but they had a vote of approval, which was unusual, in both Houses, approving Lord Ashburton's negotiations and the result, and the votes were carried by large majorities. History may not repeat itself, but oppositions sometimes do. After recording these remarks of the opposition in England and in the United States Senate, when I was writing a biography of Daniel Webster, I came to his conclusion that the attacks of Lord Palmerston and Senator Benton demonstrated pretty thoroughly that the Webster-Ashburton treaty was a good one. At all events, it has endured unchanged for 80 years.

Mr. President, I have trespassed very long on the time of the Senate, but I wished to bring these facts, so far as possible, before the Senate as a preliminary to acting upon the treaty.

There is one matter that I overlooked.

It will be remembered that in the covenant of the League of Nations there is a provision for reduction of armament, and I had the curiosity to get these minutes in order to see what they have done practically toward the reduction of armaments. This is an extract from the official journal of the League of Nations—Special Supplement No. 6—October, 1921:

Resolutions and recommendations adopted by the assembly during its second session (September 5 to October 5, 1921), Geneva, 1921.

I shall not read all the resolutions and recommendations. I shall ask to have them all printed; but I shall read the final report made by M. Léon Bourgeois, which contained the final resolutions adopted by the council:

The council postpones for the present the consideration of the assembly's resolutions 5, 7, 8, 10, and 11, and takes forthwith the following decisions:

1. The council instructs the secretary general to inform M. Viviani, the president of the temporary mixed commission, that the latter is asked to continue the work which it has begun.

2. The temporary mixed commission is invited to meet as early as possible and to lay before the council the names of new members up to the number of six, which it desires to coopt. The commission is invited to make proposals on general lines for the reduction of national armaments which, in order to secure precision, should be in the form of a draft treaty or other equally definite plan, to be presented to the council, if possible, before the assembly next year.

3. The temporary mixed commission is asked to carry out its statistical investigation upon the lines indicated in the body of the assembly report on the reduction of armaments.

4. The temporary mixed commission is requested to continue the examination of the questions of the private manufacture of armaments and the trade in arms.

5. A communication should be sent to the Governments who will participate in the forthcoming Washington conference on disarmament in the terms of the draft included in this report. In the meantime a new letter should be sent to the States which have not yet notified their attitude in respect of the convention of St. Germain, to request them to do so.

6. The temporary mixed commission shall be asked to examine—in consultation with the permanent advisory commission—whether it is advisable to address an appeal to the scientific men of the world to publish their discoveries in poison gas and similar subjects, so as to minimize the likelihood of their being used in any future war.

I ask to have the entire resolutions and recommendations printed as an appendix to my remarks.

Mr. LODGE. What I have read is simply a reference of the subject to committees to talk about it and to get information, which would not mean any action for 10 years. At least we have succeeded in getting definite action. If this treaty is ratified—as I believe it will be—by all the signatory powers, it will mean an absolute reduction of armaments, a stopping of competition in armaments, and in another year a sensible relief to the taxpayers of all the countries involved. Whatever else it is, it is a real and concrete achievement and not a reference to commissions of experts. It really means something.

Mr. President, in conclusion I only desire to say that the American delegation went into this work on the subject of armaments with but one idea, and that was so far as possible to bring about a limitation of armaments among the great maritime nations of the world. I think that has been done. I think it is work of great value, and I hope the Senate will approve and ratify it.

APPENDIX.

[Extract from League of Nations official journal (special supplement No. 6), October, 1921. Resolutions and recommendations adopted by the assembly during its second session (September 5 to October 5, 1921), Geneva, 1921.]

VI. RESOLUTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED ON THE REPORTS OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE.

1. REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS.

The assembly thanks M. Branting, chairman of the third committee, and the rapporteur, Lord Robert Cecil, for their valuable work. It is convinced of the urgent necessity of passing beyond the stage of the enunciation of principles and of proceeding to carry them into practical effect. The assembly therefore approves the report and the following resolutions submitted by the third committee with reference to the reduction of armaments:

1. That it is desirable that the temporary mixed commission should be asked to continue the work which it has begun.

2. That the temporary mixed commission be asked to make proposals on general lines for the reduction of national armaments which, in order to secure precision, should be in the form of a draft treaty or other equally definite plan, to be presented to the council, if possible, before the assembly next year.

In order to enable the temporary mixed commission to accomplish this task the council should be asked to strengthen this commission.

3. That a statistical investigation be made with regard to the armaments of the various countries upon the lines indicated in the body of the report of the third committee.

4. That the temporary mixed commission be requested to continue the examination of the question of the private manufacture of armaments and the trade in arms.

5. That the council be requested to invite all the members of the league and interested States which are not members of the league to take part in an international conference on the private manufacture of arms and the trade in arms, which should meet as soon as possible at a date to be fixed under the responsibility of the council. It is considered highly desirable that this date should be prior to the next session of the assembly.

The temporary mixed commission should be intrusted with the task of preparing the program of the conference and of submitting to it a draft convention.

6. That the urgent importance of ratifying the convention at the earliest possible moment be strongly impressed on all the States signatories to the arms traffic convention of St. Germain, whether members of the League of Nations or not, and that at the same time all nonsignatory States be invited to adhere to the convention.

The assembly expresses its earnest desire that the importance of this subject may be strongly urged at the forthcoming Conference on Disarmament at Washington.

7. The assembly, taking note of the view expressed in the report of the temporary mixed commission on the reduction of armaments with regard to the desirability of making provision for excluding the import of arms and ammunition in time of peace from countries in which the traffic is uncontrolled, invites the council to prepare a draft protocol for this purpose for the consideration of the various Governments. At the same time it expresses the earnest hope that this procedure will not in any way be permitted to delay the general ratification of the convention of St. Germain.

The steps that may eventually have to be taken for the destruction of the surplus stocks of munitions may be considered by the temporary mixed commission.

8. That, subject to the conditions set out in the recommendation of the first assembly, the recommendation that members of the league should undertake not to exceed for the next two financial years following the present year the sum total of expenditure on military, naval, and air forces provided for in the budget of that year, be again forwarded to all members of the league, together with a statement showing the replies already received to this recommendation.

9. That the temporary mixed commission be asked to examine—in consultation with the permanent advisory commission—whether it is advisable to address an appeal to the scientific men of the world to publish their discoveries in poison gas and similar subjects, so as to minimize the likelihood of their being used in any future war.

10. That it is desirable that propaganda in favor of the reduction of armaments, as contemplated in the covenant, should be carried out with earnestness and conviction among all nations.

11. In pursuance of the third resolution of the first assembly, the assembly is of opinion that the secretariat should be asked to complete the organization of the section of the secretariat dealing with the question of the reduction of armaments, and that this section should have a directorship of its own, or other equivalent organization, quite separate from and, if necessary, in addition to, those already proposed by the fourth committee of the assembly.

(Resolutions adopted on October 1, 1921.)

[Extract from minutes of the fourteenth session of the council of the League of Nations held at Geneva. Second part. September 12 to October 12, 1921.]

The members of the council of the League of Nations are represented as follows:

China by M. Wellington Koo, president.
Belgium by M. Paul Hymans.
Brazil by M. Gastão da Cunha.
The British Empire by Mr. A. J. Balfour.
France by M. Léon Bourgeois.
Italy by Marquis Imperiali.
Japan by Viscount Ishii.
Spain by M. Quinones de Leôn.
Secretary general, Sir Eric Drummond.

FOURTEENTH MEETING (PRIVATE).

Held on Wednesday, October 12, 1921, at 3.30 p. m.

Present, all the representatives of the members of the council and the secretary general.

510. Albania.

511. Resolutions of the assembly concerning the reduction of armaments.

The council adopted the report of M. Léon Bourgeois (Annex 274), together with the following resolutions:

"The council postpones for the present the consideration of the assembly's resolutions 5, 7, 8, 10, and 11, and takes forthwith the following decisions:

"1. The council instructs the secretary general to inform M. Viviani, the president of the temporary mixed commission, that the latter is asked to continue the work which it has begun.

"2. The temporary mixed commission is invited to meet as early as possible and to lay before the council the names of new members up to the number of six, which it desires to coopt. The commission is invited to make proposals on general lines for the reduction of national armaments which, in order to secure precision, should be in the form of a draft treaty, or other equally definite plan, to be presented to the council, if possible, before the assembly next year.

"3. The temporary mixed commission is asked to carry out its statistical investigation upon the lines indicated in the body of the assembly report on the reduction of armaments.

"4. The temporary mixed commission is requested to continue the examination of the questions of the private manufacture of armaments and the trade in arms.

"5. A communication should be sent to the Governments who will participate in the forthcoming Washington Conference on Disarmament in the terms of the draft included in this report. In the meantime a new letter should be sent to the States which have not yet notified their attitude in respect of the convention of St. Germain to request them to do so.

"6. The temporary mixed commission shall be asked to examine—in consultation with the permament advisory commission—whether it is advisable to address an appeal to the scientific men of the world to publish their discoveries in poison gas and similar subjects, so as to minimize the likelihood of their being used in any future war."

The British, French, and Italian representatives agreed to ask Mr. Fisher, M. Viviani, and M. Schanzer whether they could continue to serve on the commission, and if not, to request them to appoint substitutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The treaty is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment and consideration article by article.

The reading clerk read article 1, as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The contracting powers agree to limit their respective naval armament as provided in the present treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 2, as follows:

ARTICLE II.

The contracting powers may retain respectively the capital ships which are specified in chapter 2, part 1. On the coming into force of the present treaty, but subject to the following provisions of this article, all other capital ships, built or building, of the United States, the British Empire, and Japan shall be disposed of as prescribed in chapter 2, part 2.

In addition to the capital ships specified in chapter 2, part 1, the United States may complete and retain two ships of the West Virginia class now under construction. On the completion of these two ships the North Dakota and Delaware shall be disposed of as prescribed in chapter 2, part 2.

The British Empire may, in accordance with the replacement table in chapter 2, part 3, construct two new capital ships not exceeding 35,000 tons (35,560 metric tons) standard displacement each. On the completion of the said two ships the Thunderer, King George V, Ajax, and Centurion shall be disposed of as prescribed in chapter 2, part 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 3, as follows:

ARTICLE III.

Subject to the provisions of article 2, the contracting powers shall abandon their respective capital shipbuilding program, and no new capital ships shall be constructed or acquired by any of the contracting powers except replacement tonnage which may be constructed or acquired as specified in chapter 2, part 3.

Ships which are replaced in accordance with chapter 2, part 3, shall be disposed of as prescribed in part 2 of that chapter.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Nelson	Stanley
Ball	Hale	New	Sterling
Borah	Harris	Oddie	Sutherland
Broussard	Harrison	Overman	Swanson
Bursum	Hitchcock	Page	Townsend
Cameron	Johnson	Pepper	Trammell
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Underwood
Colt	Kellogg	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Cummins	King	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Lenroot	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Edge	Lodge	Shields	Warren
Ernst	McCormick	Shortridge	Williams
Fernald	McNary	Simmons	Willis
France	Moses	Stanfield

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon agreeing to article 3. Without objection, the article is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 4, as follows:

ARTICLE IV.

The total capital ship replacement tonnage of each of the contracting powers shall not exceed in standard displacement, for the United States, 525,000 tons (533,400 metric tons); for the British Empire, 525,000 tons (533,400 metric tons); for France, 175,000 tons (177,800 metric tons); for Italy, 175,000 tons (177,800 metric tons); for Japan, 315,000 tons (320,040 metric tons).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to article 4. Without objection, the article is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 5, as follows:

ARTICLE V.

No capital ship exceeding 35,000 tons (35,560 metric tons) standard displacement shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 6, as follows:

ARTICLE VI.

No capital ship of any of the contracting powers shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 16 inches (406 millimeters).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 6 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 7, as follows:

ARTICLE VII.

The total tonnage for aircraft carriers of each of the contracting powers shall not exceed in standard displacement, for the United States, 135,000 tons (137,160 metric tons); for the British Empire, 135,000 tons (137,160 metric tons); for France, 60,000 tons (60,960 metric tons); for Italy, 60,000 tons (60,960 metric tons); for Japan, 81,000 tons (82,296 metric tons).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection article 7 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 8, as follows:

ARTICLE VIII.

The replacement of aircraft carriers shall be effected only as prescribed in chapter 2, part 3; provided, however, that all aircraft carrier tonnage in existence or building on November 12, 1921, shall be considered experimental, and may be replaced, within the total tonnage limit prescribed in article 7, without regard to its age.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection article 8 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 9, as follows:

ARTICLE IX.

No aircraft carrier exceeding 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers.

However, any of the contracting powers may, provided that its total tonnage allowance of aircraft carriers is not thereby exceeded, build not more than two aircraft carriers, each of a tonnage of not more than 33,000 tons (33,528 metric tons) standard displacement, and in order to effect economy any of the contracting powers may use for this purpose any two of their ships, whether constructed or in course of construction, which would otherwise be scrapped under the provisions of article 2. The armament of any aircraft carriers exceeding 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement shall be in accordance with the requirements of article 10, except that the total number of guns to be carried in case any of such guns be of a caliber exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters), except antiaircraft guns and guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters), shall not exceed eight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection article 9 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 10, as follows:

ARTICLE X.

No aircraft carrier of any of the contracting powers shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 8 inches (203 millimeters). Without prejudice to the provisions of article 9, if the armament carried includes guns exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters) in caliber the total number of guns carried, except antiaircraft guns and guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters), shall not exceed 10. If alternatively the armament contains no guns exceeding 6 inches (152 millimeters) in caliber, the number of guns is not limited. In either case the number of antiaircraft guns and of guns not exceeding 5 inches (127 millimeters) is not limited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 10 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 11, as follows:

ARTICLE XI.

No vessel of war exceeding 10,000 tons (10,160 metric tons) standard displacement, other than a capital ship or aircraft carrier, shall be acquired by, or constructed by, for, or within the jurisdiction of, any of the contracting powers. Vessels not specifically built as fighting ships nor taken in time of peace under government control for fighting purposes, which are employed on fleet duties or as troop transports or in some other way for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of hostilities otherwise than as fighting ships, shall not be within the limitations of this article.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 11 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 12, as follows:

ARTICLE XII.

No vessel of war of any of the contracting powers, hereafter laid down, other than a capital ship, shall carry a gun with a caliber in excess of 8 inches (203 millimeters).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 12 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 13, as follows:

ARTICLE XIII.

Except as provided in article 9, no ship designated in the present treaty to be scrapped may be reconverted into a vessel of war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 13 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 14, as follows:

ARTICLE XIV.

No preparations shall be made in merchant ships in time of peace for the installation of warlike armaments for the purpose of converting such ships into vessels of war, other than the necessary stiffening of decks for the mounting of guns not exceeding 6-inch (152 millimeters) caliber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 14 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 15, as follows:

ARTICLE XV.

No vessel of war constructed within the jurisdiction of any of the contracting powers for a noncontracting power shall exceed the limitations as to displacement and armament prescribed by the present treaty for vessels of a similar type which may be constructed by or for any of the contracting powers: Provided, however, That the displacement for aircraft carriers constructed for a noncontracting power shall in no case exceed 27,000 tons (27,432 metric tons) standard displacement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 15 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 16, as follows:

ARTICLE XVI.

If the construction of any vessel of war for a noncontracting power is undertaken within the jurisdiction of any of the contracting powers, such power shall promptly inform the other contracting powers of the date of the signing of the contract and the date on which the keel of the ship is laid, and shall also communicate to them the particulars relating to the ship prescribed in chapter 2, part 3, section 1 (b), (4), and (5).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 16 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 17, as follows:

ARTICLE XVII.

In the event of a contracting power being engaged in war, such power shall not use as a vessel of war any vessel of war which may be under construction within its jurisdiction for any other power, or which may have been constructed within its jurisdiction for another power and not delivered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 17 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 18, as follows:

ARTICLE XVIII.

Each of the contracting powers undertakes not to dispose by gift, sale, or any mode of transfer of any vessel of war in such a manner that such vessel may become a vessel of war in the navy of any foreign power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, article 18 is agreed to.

The reading clerk read article 19, as follows:

ARTICLE XIX.

The United States, the British Empire, and Japan agree that the status quo at the time of the signing of the present treaty with regard to fortifications and naval bases shall be maintained in their respective territories and possessions specified hereunder:

(1) The insular possessions which the United States now hold or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of the United States, Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, not including the Aleutian Islands, and (b) the Hawaiian Islands.

(2) Hongkong and the insular possessions which the British Empire now holds or may hereafter acquire in the Pacific Ocean east of the meridian of 110° east longitude, except (a) those adjacent to the coast of Canada, (b) the Commonwealth of Australia and its territories, and (c) New Zealand.

(3) The following insular territories and possessions of Japan in the Pacific Ocean, to wit: The Kurile Islands, the Bonin Islands, Amami-Oshima, the Loochoo Islands, Formosa, and the Pescadores, and any insular territories or possessions in the Pacific Ocean which Japan may hereafter acquire.

The maintenance of the status quo under the foregoing provisions implies that no new fortifications or naval bases shall be established in the territories and possessions specified; that no measures shall be taken to increase the existing naval facilities for the repair and maintenance of naval forces; and that no increase shall be made in the coast defenses of the territories and possessions above specified. This restriction, however, does not preclude such repair and replacement of worn-out weapons and equipment as is customary in naval and military establishments in time of peace.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] not being in the Chamber at this moment, whether any efforts other than those referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts were made to bring other nations into the naval conference with a view to securing an agreement upon their part to limit naval armament.

It is clear that the treaty binds only the nations who have subscribed to it. As I understand the treaty, there is no inhibition whatever upon other nations, and they may engage in the construction of capital ships, either battleships or battle cruisers, and for that matter all forms of naval war craft or war agencies, without limitation or restriction.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator asks me a question that is manifestly not within my power to answer, for this reason: The Senator will recall that Congress requested that a conference be called looking to a reduction of armament by the nations of Great Britain, Japan, and the United States. That conference was not called by the delegates who attended it, but by the President of the United States. The President of the United States extended the scope of the conference beyond the three powers named, to France and Italy. Whether the President made any effort to invite any other nations in or not, I do not know.

Of course, when the conference met it was not within the power of the delegates to the conference to invite other delegates into the conference because, acting as commissioners for the President of the United States, their powers were limited to the call that he had issued and to conferring with the nations which had been called together on the invitation of the President of the United States.

But manifestly it did not make any difference, because outside of the five powers which signed the treaty there are no nations in the world that have navies which can reasonably be called navies, and there is no other nation in the world whose navy this Government should desire to reduce. What may happen in the future no man can tell, but certainly there is no probability of any nation in the world, outside of the five nations which signed the pending treaty, building a navy that would in any way rival even the navies of France and Italy, who have the smallest navies of the powers which signed the treaty.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, to much of his statement I agree, namely, that the President called these nations and, of course, the delegates selected by the President to represent the United States could not amplify or extend the invitation; but the delegates must have invited Italy and France to become parties to this naval agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not the delegates or the commissioners. I believe they are called delegates commonly, but their commissions read as commissioners. No; they did not invite those nations. The President of the United States invited Italy and France to the Conference on Limitation of Armament.

Mr. KING. Oh, I understand, to the conference, but I referred to the treaty now before us.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There were two invitations issued, one to the four nations beside those nations included in the limitation of armament, and under the President's invitation as agreed to by those powers it was limited to those four nations outside of the United States.

The other request was in reference to far eastern questions, where eight other powers were invited in by the President of the United States, and their powers were limited to the far eastern questions. Of course, those two separate organizations were working at the same time within the scope of the invitation which had been accepted, and so far as the commissioners to the conference were concerned, they had no powers in that matter whatever.

Mr. KING. The Senator recalls that Holland participated in the conference?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the far eastern conference under the invitation of the President.

Mr. KING. And the Senator doubtless has perceived that the representative of Holland, since his return, has been severely criticized because his Government was not called upon to participate in the conference, or, rather, in the pending treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator will permit me, he was criticized because he did not make his Government a party to the four-power treaty.

Mr. KING. Yes; and to the naval limitation treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Illinois has very much information, but he does not possess all the springs of information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, the Senator from Utah refers to a matter that was beyond my jurisdiction. As one of the commissioners or delegates to the conference, I had no right to extend such an invitation. The stream can not rise higher than its source, and when I accepted the President's commission I and my colleagues on the American delegation were limited to the duties prescribed in our instructions. Of course, the invitation could not have been extended by the delegates; it must have been extended by the Nation; and we did not represent the Nation in that respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may make one observation in reply to a suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama. If I understood his attitude correctly, it was that because the United States has no fear of any other nation becoming its naval rival, therefore we are not interested whether the other nations construct capital ships or not. I suggest to the Senator that the United States can not afford to take that position. If a large number of nations should embark upon the construction of capital ships, it seems to me that it would be a cause of concern to the United States, because when such ships were completed, though the number constructed by each nation might be small, a crisis might arise which would drive those nations together. The fact that the four-power treaty, but recently ratified, constitutes, as many believe, an alliance, and the other nations may form alliances, and some nations having capital ships may unite to form an alliance, or combination. Their navies might not constitute a menace to the United States, but the fact that they have capital ships and continue to build them might be regarded as a cloud in the sky which might presage international controversies and militate against the peace of the world. So it does seem to me that it would have been wise for the President at some period of the conference to have attempted to secure the consent of other nations to a policy restricting the construction of capital ships.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think the Senator's proposition is entirely theoretical. I think if many of the nations to which he refers had been invited to disarm when they had no battleships, they would have wondered why they had been summoned to the conference; and if that had been done it certainly would have taken a good deal more time to have worked out in this treaty the problem which Congress had laid down to be solved. If nations which did not have ships and did not have armaments had been invited to disarm it would have been like calling on a citizen to lay down his gun when he does not have a gun. Of course, however, I am not speaking of the question with any authority, for, as I have said, the commissioners to the conference had no authority to act in the matter.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator from Alabama will perceive that the call for the conference was not limited to the consideration of capital ships, but to all forms of naval armament?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, when I said "capital ships" I meant any fighting ships. I do not think there is a thing in the proposition advanced by the Senator from Utah except a theory, for it is quite probable that during the 15 years of the life of this treaty no nation in the world not a party to the treaty will have any naval armament which need be regarded seriously, because it takes time and it takes a great deal of money to build capital ships; and without capital ships, of course, no nation could stand up an hour in battle line against the navy of any one of the powers which have joined in this treaty.

Mr. KING. This treaty places no limitations whatever upon the construction and use for war purposes of submarines?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, it does not.

Mr. KING. It places no limitations whatever upon aircraft as a weapon in war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should be glad if the Senator from Utah would ask his questions all at one time, for I do not care to be getting up and down, though I am glad to answer them. Of course, the Senator knows just as well as I do, for he has read the treaty, that there is no limitation on submarines, because the conferees were unable to agree to a limitation on submarines. It was not because we did not want to agree but because we could not reach such an agreement. There is no limitation on aircraft as such, yet there is a limitation on aircraft carriers, which for naval purposes limits the amount of aircraft that may be used.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wanted to lend emphasis to the matter by having the Senator from Alabama answer my questions singly, not en bloc. It is obvious that some of the good people of the United States who think that the ratification of this treaty will bring about the millennium and will, in a naval sense, completely disarm all of the powers signatory to the treaty, are mistaken. I venture to assert that there will be great activity on the part of many nations in the construction of submarines and airplanes and other naval weapons and instruments of naval warfare.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate, but I have a few words to say in reference to the pending treaty. The Senator from Utah has given me the opportunity to say them now.

The Senator from Utah states—I do not know whether he states it in the way of an objection to the treaty or not—that the people of the United States are going to be very much disappointed in the treaty because it does not prevent in the future the building of all types of naval vessels. Mr. President, I think that one of the great acts of Congress, and one which history will record as one of the mileposts in the progress of civilization, was the passage of a joint resolution by the Senate of the United States, which was finally passed by Congress, requesting the President of the United States to call a conference of the three great naval powers—the British Empire, Japan, and the United States—looking to a limitation of armament. I think it was wise on the part of the President to extend that invitation also to France and Italy. I do not say that the pending treaty is a treaty of peace, for it is manifest that, notwithstanding the many great points for good in the treaty, when it is brought down to its last analysis the naval strength of the five powers which have joined in it is the same that it was last year, relatively speaking, that their relative strength will continue to be the same.

There is a manifest reason for that. The subject was carefully gone over by the American delegates in the beginning before they made a proposal to the conference favoring a limitation of armaments. We could not have proposed to the other nations that they limit their armaments and reduce their building programs because they did not need their navies; that was a question that could have been discussed for weeks and months and years. We could not put it on the basis that one nation was greater than another, for they were all sovereign nations and had a right to do what they pleased within the scope of their national power. Our Government invited them here to lay aside a part of their sovereign rights by entering into a contract to limit the building of navies in the future. When we came to seek a basis, the only basis which we could find on which we might hope to reach a favorable agreement was the status quo, the amount of armament which each nation possessed when the conference met.

That is the basis on which the proposal of the American Government was worked out; that was the basis on which this treaty was finally agreed upon. It involved a reduction in armament and a limitation of armament, and in the end it left each one of the five nations relatively in the same position, except that France and Italy have been given some little advantage, due to the fact that they had not engaged in adding to their naval strength during the Great War. The difference in their favor, however, is not a material one.

Mr. President, I do not think that this treaty is going to be a disappointment to the American people. We may discuss and contend and differ about the other treaties which have come before the Senate from the conference, but I do not believe there has ever been an event in American history that was hailed with more unanimous approval on the part of the American people than the announcement of the American delegation to the conference in favor of stopping the building of battleships and armaments and a reduction of the navies of the world, involving, of course, a reduction in the cost of building and maintenance. Irrespective of party, irrespective of class or clan, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, a wave of approval swept over the country; and, in my judgement, so far as this naval treaty is concerned, that approval still remains in the hearts and minds of the American people. And it is an accomplishment, Mr. President, not so much because of the reduction in the number of battleships, not so much because of the details of the proposal, but it is one of the greatest accomplishments in the history of the world that such an agreement has been reached by great nations. This treaty, which the Senate of the United States will probably ratify to-day, is a milestone in the history of the world.

For ages past men have talked about laying aside the sword, about reducing armaments, about lifting the burden of the bayonet and the soldier from the backs of the masses of the people, but nothing looking toward a realization of that great end has ever been done by international agreement. One nation may have reduced its armament and another increased its armament, but for the first time in the history of the world five nations, great in their naval power and armament, have met together and not only agreed to reduce their armament, not only agreed to lift that burden of taxation from their people, but they have agreed to a naval holiday of 10 years, in which no building shall be done with the exception of replacement ships; that for 10 years they shall cease to arm and threaten each other by continual increases in their naval establishments.

More than that, while the actual saving flowing from this treaty in reduced appropriations for this year or next year may not be very great, yet there will be many hundreds of millions of dollars saved to the American people in the years to come if this treaty goes into effect.

Had we continued the program of 1916 upon which we had entered and then continued the program of 1918, which Congress had ordered, we would have piled the appropriations up into the hundreds and hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars before we had carried out those programs; and we would have forced the other great powers to have taken similar action or lose their position of naval strength. As a result of the conference, the only five nations possessing naval armament, after meeting together, have agreed to reduce their armaments and to stop the reckless race of building.

I think this treaty is a document of which the Congress of the United States should be proud. So far as the delegates to the conference were concerned, they were merely the hands of the Government; the conference itself was initiated right here in this Chamber; and I think that every Member of the Congress who voted for the resolution calling the conference together is entitled to his share of the credit for this undertaking.

Mr. President, the pending treaty provides not only for a reduction of arms, not only does it declare a naval holiday for 10 years, but it establishes a precedent in the world that may hereafter mean an onward step in the realm of peace among nations. No man can predict what the future holds, but I believe firmly that at the end of the 15-year period, which is the life of this treaty, the great democratic peoples of the world, having found that they could meet and agree not to arm nation against nation, will demand that the action which has been taken here shall be renewed in the future, and, instead of the nations of the world arming against each other, they will disarm for the universal peace of the world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I entertain no doubt that this treaty will be ratified by practically the unanimous vote of this body, as it should be. That it was a great accomplishment no one can and no one, so far as I know, has any disposition to deny. I rise, however, to call attention in a very general way to how far the hopes of the people of the United States with respect to general disarmament have failed by the course that has been taken.

It will be remembered that when the matter was under consideration by the Senate during the winter of 1920-21 some contention arose as to whether, if a conference were called, its activities should be confined to limitation of naval armaments alone, or whether an effort should be made to accomplish a reduction in the land armaments of the world as well as the naval armaments. It may be well to recall at this time some of the history of this great conference.

It was provided by article 8 of the covenant of the League of Nations that the council should be charged with the duty of preparing a plan for general disarmament, to be submitted to the respective Governments of the world for their approval or disapproval; and early after the organization of the council it undertook that duty, appointing for the purpose of preparing a plan a committee consisting of three representatives from each of the nations represented upon the council, one a military officer, one a naval officer, and the third an officer of the aerial service, except in the case of Brazil, where one officer acted in the threefold capacity. This action was taken by the council in the month of May, 1920. It proceeded with its work, but, of course, was immediately embarrassed by the fact that the United States was not represented upon the committee, and it was recognized that it would be impossible to accomplish anything in the nature of a general reduction of armaments without the cooperation of the United States. It reported its difficulties to the council, which passed a resolution asking the Government of the United States to send representatives to sit in a consultative capacity with the committee which was then dealing with the subject.

I will have you bear in mind that represented upon that committee was every State having a representative on the council of the League of Nations, namely, Great Britain, France, Japan, Italy, Spain, Belgium, and Brazil. That body was engaged, not merely in an effort to accomplish a reduction in naval armaments but in an effort to accomplish a reduction in land as well as naval armaments. An invitation was sent, as I say, to the President of the United States, who, as I always thought, rather inconsiderately declined the invitation, and thereupon a resolution was introduced in the Senate requesting the President to accept the invitation and send representatives to that committee thus engaged in the work, so that at the time the Senate first took action with respect to the matter the work of endeavoring to get an agreement between the nations of the earth with respect to the limitation of armaments was well under way, and under way pursuant to the Versailles treaty and the covenant of the League of Nations.

Four days thereafter the celebrated Borah resolution, asking that a conference of the three great naval powers be held for the purpose of agreeing upon a plan of limitation of naval armaments, was introduced, and, with the resolution to which I have referred, was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Meanwhile, the naval appropriation bill came before the Senate, and an amendment was offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] in substance like the Borah resolution, which received the approbation of the Senate, and after some delay in the House, said at the time to be due to Executive interference, the House acceded to the amendment to the appropriation bill to which I have referred, and the appropriation bill was thus agreed to by both Houses carrying the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Simply in the interest of accuracy, let me say that I do not know that I understood the Senator; but the resolution which was offered by the Senator from New Jersey in the form of an amendment to the naval appropriation bill died with that session, because the appropriation bill died. The resolution was reintroduced at the next session, went to the Naval Committee, was there defeated, and when the naval appropriation bill came out was again offered and afterwards adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator is correct about that. That feature I had forgotten about. However, the question was discussed at some length on the floor as to whether the invitation, when it was extended, should not be sufficiently comprehensive to embrace limitation of land armament as well as limitation of naval armament; but, as I say, it went through restricted to naval armament. However, when the invitation was extended it was general in its terms—a conference for the limitation of armament, not alone naval armament but land armament as well.

It may be well to recall that the three nations embraced in the Borah resolution—Great Britain, the United States, and Japan—grievously burdened as they were by the competition which had grown up between them as well as by reason of obligations incurred during the war, were still perfectly able, in view of the resources of all of them, to carry the burden which they were assuming. It was heavy, indeed. Our appropriation bill for naval construction amounted to something over $100,000,000—$105,000,000, as I recall—out of a total for all military purposes of something over $800,000,000.

I am not sure that a real agreement ever could be arrived at among the nations of the earth—though I see no reason why it should not be—for a reduction of armaments until they were really of no value for purposes of international war, but were useful simply for police purposes; but if such an agreement could be arrived at I see no reason why our appropriations for military purposes should not be cut in two. My recollection is that in the year 1910 and thereabouts our annual appropriations for both the Army and Navy were not to exceed $360,000,000, while last year, three years after the close of the war, we appropriated something over $800,000,000.

I can see no reason why that great bill should not be cut in two through some reasonable agreement among the nations of the earth looking to a limitation of armaments. That would mean the saving of $400,000,000 a year. After 10 years' work, and with the expenditure of about that much money, we constructed the Panama Canal, regarded at the time, and still regarded, as one of the greatest engineering works ever undertaken and carried to a successful conclusion by the energy and skill of man, and we ought to save enough on our Military Establishment every year to build a Panama Canal, or to construct public works equivalent thereto.

It was not only important to the United States directly that the limitation should extend to land armament as well as to naval armament, but it is all important to the great countries of Europe, which are being consumed annually regularly now by the frightful burden created by their land armaments. Until recently, at least, France, with a national debt of over $50,000,000,000, was endeavoring to carry an army of 800,000 men, consequently disturbing, as a matter of course, to the peace and quiet of all Europe. Italy maintains an army of 350,000 men, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia each 150,000 men, more than is deemed adequate for the protection of this great country of ours, reaching from ocean to ocean, and numbering a population of over 100,000,000 people. Belgium has an army of 150,000 men. The savings of their people, which ought to be utilized in the restoration of industry and in the reestablishment of business, are being consumed daily to support these great military establishments. The consequence is felt by us as well as by them.

No one can doubt that the distressed state of industry in this country is directly due to the fact that the capital of Europe, the accumulations and the savings of the people of Europe, which ought to be utilized in the establishment of industry there, which would call for and consume the products of industry in this country, are idle.

I remarked that the call of the President for the conference, apparently in recognition of the situation of affairs to which I have just briefly alluded, was for a conference for general limitation of armaments. Yet apparently no effort was made, at least none of which I am aware, to secure anything in the nature of an agreement for the limitation of land armament.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the Senator recalls that France absolutely refused to go into any agreement for a limitation of land armament.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not recall anything of the kind.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is the fact, just the same.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not recall that. I read Mr. Briand's speech with very great care; but I remind the Senator that the invitation to which I have referred, inviting the Government of the United States to participate in the deliberations of the committee, was extended to us by France, and she would hardly be in a situation to decline. But why should she decline, and what reason was assigned by France for declining? Was it impossible to satisfy France so as to induce her not to decline, and what effort was made to satisfy France in order to induce her to consent to consider land disarmament? Those are matters with respect to which I should like to have some information, and I intended to address an inquiry along that line to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], if he had done me the honor to stay and hear what I had to say.

Mr. President, we need not be in very great doubt about why France took the position at the conference which she did assume. She assented, in the first place, to the provisions in the covenant of the League of Nations in relation to the preparation of a plan of disarmament, because she was guaranteed against further invasion by Germany by the separate treaty which she made with the Government of the United States and with Great Britain. She was by that treaty assured by both those nations that in case of further aggression against her people by Germany, they would both come to her aid.

I have all kinds of sympathy with the attitude taken by the people of France. I do not blame them at all for being in a highly sensitive frame of mind with reference to a future invasion of their territory by Germany. They have every reason to feel apprehensive about it. Their memories concerning the invasion of 1870 are still keen, if they had not the more recent experience to make them extremely cautious in that regard; and they can recall, no doubt, the history of their country during the Napoleonic wars, and the troubles which succeeded them.

But, Mr. President, what were we asked to do? We were asked simply to undertake toward France an agreement jointly with Great Britain, that in case her soil were again invaded by Germany we would come to her aid. That was the price we were obliged to pay, and the only price we were obliged to pay, to get France into a conference for the reduction of her land forces, which would, of course, be followed by a reduction by Italy, by Yugoslavia, by Belgium, and by the other countries associated with her.

I never was able to understand why the United States should not enter into that kind of an agreement. I never was able to understand what reason could be urged for opposition to the treaty which was negotiated with France to that end. We had just gone to the aid of France, to help her repel the invader from her soil. If Germany had known at the outset that the United States would join in the war with France and if she had known that Great Britain would join in the war with France she never would have dared to invade the soil of France, and the war of 1914 would never have occurred, or at least it would not have occurred when it did.

So, looking to the future, Mr. President, what had we to pay? All that was necessary was to ratify that treaty and agree with France to go to her aid in case Germany should again invade her soil. That was the text of Mr. Briand's speech. He insisted that they were going to protect themselves against a further invasion by Germany, inasmuch as Great Britain and the United States were not ready to carry out the agreement negotiated in their behalf by Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Wilson. We never would have been called upon to pay a dollar or to put a man into the field if we made an agreement of that kind, because Germany would never dare invade France if there were an agreement with the United States and Great Britain that they would come to her aid if Germany did. It would cost us absolutely nothing. On the other hand, Mr. President, if we look forward to a period 25, 50, or 75 years hence and we find then a Germany rehabilitated, a great military power again, so puissant in herself, or with the aid of such allies as she could engage, as that she dared invade France again, we would again be in exactly the same situation in which we found ourselves in 1917, and with or without any agreement with France, we would be obliged to come to her aid for our own protection.

So I should like very much to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts, if he were present, or the Senator from Alabama, what advances were made to the delegates from France along the lines of the treaty negotiated in 1919 by Mr. Wilson, looking to an agreement between the United States and Great Britain on the one side and France on the other, to protect her against a further invasion from Germany.

I appreciate, as a matter of course, Mr. President, that when Mr. Briand came over here and found no disposition whatever upon the part of those in power in this country to carry out that agreement or to ratify it or to negotiate something substantially the same, he spoke his piece and went home. I have never understood that it was in any wise intimated to him that any protection would be given to France at all. Under those circumstances nothing else was to be expected of France except an answer to the effect that she could not consent to the reduction of her army.

I find no fault with this present treaty, Mr. President. I am curious to know, indeed I am profoundly anxious to know, why something was not done, if nothing was done, to induce France to consider the subject, some kind of guaranty to be given her of protection against a further invasion by Germany.

I still retain the hope that the burden of these great armies will be found so oppressive upon the peoples of Europe that the committee of the council engaged in this matter will still find an opportunity to do the work with which it is charged, and that we may look to them, as we must now look, for relief from the present oppressive conditions, if relief is to be had at all. I repeat the profound regret I feel that the conference here accomplished so little, much as I am pleased that it accomplished as much as it did. I am very glad to give my approval to its work.

I see the Senator from Massachusetts has come into the Chamber, and I will be very glad to get the information I desire from him, if he can give it to us. I was calling attention to the fact that the call of the President for the conference was for the consideration of limitation of armaments; not for the limitation of naval armaments, as contemplated, but for the limitation of armaments generally.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that when I began to speak.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The work, however, appeared to be limited to navies, so far as the limitation of armament was concerned, and I wanted to inquire of the Senator why that was.

Mr. LODGE. I explained that when I began my speech.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unfortunately, I was unable to be present.

Mr. LODGE. That was the first point I took up. Of course, the Secretary of State brought forward his proposition about the limitation of armaments on the first day of the conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that was for the limitation of naval armaments only.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; for the limitation of naval armaments. The second day was taken up in the appointment of committees only, and the third meeting, about a week later, was when M. Briand made his speech, and none of us were surprised at it, but expected it. He made a very strong and eloquent address, in which he said it was impossible for France to make a reduction in her land forces. That, of course, put an end to the conference doing anything about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all right. Of course, Mr. Briand said it was impossible for them to reduce, because they had to protect themselves from further invasions from Germany. What I want to know is whether any further effort was made to make any arrangement by which France could be in a way assured against a further invasion by Germany?

Mr. LODGE. None was made by the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Or by anyone else?

Mr. LODGE. Not here, that I know of. Subsequently, of course, the Senator saw in the newspapers that England made some offer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Was any suggestion made that the Government of the United States might be willing to ratify a treaty substantially like that negotiated in Paris?

Mr. LODGE. Not that I know of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was no tender of that kind on the part of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. No; there was nothing said about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that when Mr. Briand made his speech saying that by reason of the prospects of further invasion from Germany they could not disarm, that ended the thing?

Mr. LODGE. That ended it, certainly, because he could not agree to anything.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield the floor.

Mr. EDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana a question. I understood him to say that the resolution originally passed by the Senate requesting the President to call a conference to consider the limitation of armaments included only the three nations—Great Britain, Japan, and the United States. It is quite correct that the resolution which orignally passed the Senate was limited to those three nations, but near the close of the session, at which time the naval appropriation bill was under consideration, when I presented the amendment, I included also France and Italy, and the matter as considered by the Senate requested the President to invite the four nations.

At that time the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], as I recall the debate, felt that the presence of France and Italy might not assist in bringing about actual results, and in reaching a conclusion and an agreement to limit armaments, because of the fact that from the standpoint of naval power, they of course were not in the same class with the other three nations; and that suggestion was accepted on the floor, as I recall, unanimously, without a division. That amendment, as the Senator from Idaho had correctly stated, passed the Senate, as I recall it, by a unanimous vote after an amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana was defeated, the suggested amendment proposing to refer the entire matter to the League of Nations for consideration. The naval appropriation bill died with the close of the session, so that of course that particular action was of no direct force.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course I have not any information as to what the Senator from New Jersey may have thought before tendering the amendment.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator must have misunderstood what I stated. I said that I introduced the amendment, which was debated on the floor of the Senate, including the five nations, but during the debate by agreement, as I recall it now, I do not think by an act of the Senate, the two nations were taken out because of the feeling that perhaps under the circumstances they could not contribute to a unanimous agreement. I personally disagreed with that viewpoint, although I felt that the matter was of sufficient importance to be passed even with the limited number of nations included. I took the viewpoint that a greater number of nations would result in greater benefit, as has been proven by the actual result of the conference itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not recall that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey underwent any amendment during the course of its consideration. It reads as follows:

The President is authorized and requested—

That is the question as it was considered and not as it was passed. It was in that shape on the 1st day of March, 1921:

The President is authorized and requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to invite the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan to send representatives to a conference, which shall be charged with the duty of promptly entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval building program of each of said Governments, to wit, the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, shall be substantially reduced annually during the next five years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which conclusion is to be reported to their respective Governments for their approval.

Mr. EDGE. There is no question between the Senator from Montana and myself as to the amendment as it was finally adopted. He is entirely correct. I am simply drawing his attention to the fact that as introduced the thought of the proponent of the amendment was, as I am quite sure the RECORD will disclose, to include the countries of France and Italy, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date will disclose a debate running over several hours, as I remember it now, in which the Senator from Idaho, the Senator from Montana, the Senator from New Jersey, and others participated on the question of whether these two nations should be included or excluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not undertake to controvert the statement of the Senator from New Jersey. I merely say that I have no recollection of it, and it was in this form when I discussed it on March 1, 1921.

However, I would not like to have the statement of the Senator from New Jersey that I proposed to let the matter be referred to the League of Nations go without some comment. The fact about the matter is that prior to all that time the council of the League of Nations, through its committee, was engaged in dealing with the subject. An invitation was extended to this Government to send representatives to join in that work which was then going on. My amendment proposed that the invitation be accepted. It read as follows:

The President is further requested—

That is, in addition to the course suggested by the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey—

The President is further requested to express to the council of the League of Nations the earnest desire of the Government of the United States to cooperate with the commission by the said council appointed charged with the formulation of plans looking to a general reduction of armaments, for submission to the several Governments for their consideration and action, and that he be, and he hereby is, further requested promptly to designate with due authority representatives to sit with such commission in a consultative capacity pursuant to the invitation heretofore extended by the said council to the Government of the United States.

Now, if the representatives had been sent in response to that invitation extended to us by France, as well as by the other nations, how could France refuse to sit in the conference and consider land disarmament as well as naval disarmament?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it seems to me before we vote upon the pending treaty that it is perfectly reasonable to trace somewhat the genesis of the idea which has now finally been incorporated in the form of a solemn treaty which is likely to receive the almost unanimous vote of this body.

I believe we can legitimately go back as far as the year 1916, because when the naval appropriation bill for that year was passed, providing as it did in war time for a large naval program, an amendment was incorporated in the bill authorizing and directing the President of the United States, when an opportune time arrived after the close of the war, to call a conference in Washington for the purpose of entering upon an agreement for disarmament. That resolution was introduced in the House by a Democrat and was passed by the Democratic House of Representatives, and came to the Senate and was here accepted.

Coming down, now, to a period after the close of the war we find that on December 11, 1920, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] again brought the matter of the disarmament movement before the Senate by offering a resolution urging the President of the United States to accept an invitation from the League of Nations to participate unofficially in the meeting of the League of Nations commission on the subject of disarmament. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, then as now Republican, and was never reported. The Senator from Montana made an appeal to the Senate at that time to the effect that, notwithstanding the fact that the United States had not become a member of the League of Nations, it could very properly cooperate with the league in the work of agreeing upon a plan of disarmament in order to save the world from bankruptcy.

Some three days later, namely, on the 14th day of December, 1920, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] introduced a resolution which, omitting the preamble, read as follows:

That the President of the United States is requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to advise the Governments of Great Britain and Japan, respectively, that this Government will at once take up directly with their Governments and without waiting upon the action of any other nation the question of disarmament, with a view of quickly coming to an understanding by which the building naval programs of each of said Governments, to wit, that of Great Britain, Japan, and the United States, shall be annually reduced during the next five years 50 per cent of the present estimates or figures.

Second, that it is the sense of the Congress, in case such an understanding can be had, that it will conform its appropriations and building plans to such agreement.

Resolved further, That this proposition is suggested by the Congress of the United States to accomplish immediately a substantial reduction of the naval armaments of the world.

That resolution introduced by the Senator from Idaho was favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, with certain amendments, on January 18, 1921.

The Senate not acting upon the resolution, the same Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on February 15 offered his resolution in substance as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill, and during the discussion of that bill in the Senate from that time on until the hour of adjournment the subject of disarmament was a live one in the Senate.

Finally, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], on the 1st of March, almost the last day of the session, offered an amendment in the same terms, almost in the same words, and it was adopted. Unfortunately, however, that never became a law for the reason that the naval appropriation bill was not perfected before the adjournment on the 4th of March, having been, as I recall, tied up in conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. While the Senator is giving the various steps which were being taken, may I call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Idaho also offered a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, inquiring as to whether or not there might be a suspension of the 1916 program?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had that in mind, but I want to make this a close history if I can. I examined that matter also.

After Congress reconvened under the call of President Harding, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] promptly reintroduced his resolution on April 13, and, it not having been acted upon, a little later, on the 4th day of May, he again offered it as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill then again pending in the Senate.

Now, up to that time it was well understood that President Harding's administration was opposed to this plan of a conference for the reduction of armament. The influence of the administration was used in the House of Representatives during the consideration of that bill, and it was sufficient to prevent the incorporation of such a provision in the bill by the House of Representatives.

Finally, on the 13th day of May, as I recall it, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] openly stated upon the floor of the Senate that as a result of conversations with the President and as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he felt justified in saying that President Harding was opposed to the amendment being inserted in the naval appropriation bill and opposed to having Congress direct him to call a disarmament conference in Washington. I think that will be found in the RECORD on May 13.

Mr. EDGE. Has the Senator the exact language before him used by the Senator from Maine in making the statement to which he refers?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I should like to read the exact language.

Mr. EDGE. I should like to have the exact language, as it has been referred to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall be glad if the Senator from Mississippi will read it.

Mr. HARRISON. On May 13, 1921, I think at several places the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] made such a statement. At one place in the RECORD he said:

> Mr. HALE. I stated that my impression, after talking with the President, was that he considered that this is not the time to go ahead with a resolution of this kind. Of course, the Senator realizes that our foreign relations at the present time are extremely delicate and that the country at large is looking to the President to straighten out those foreign relations.

At another place on the same page of the RECORD he said:

> Mr. HALE. I will say that I went to see the President with the Senator from Washington, and we talked over the question of disarmament, and I gathered from what was said there that the President thought it was not necessary for Congress to go ahead in this way with a resolution asking for disarmament.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Nevertheless, the Senator from Idaho, in cooperation with Senators on this side of the aisle, pressed the idea of incorporating in the naval appropriation bill a demand for a disarmament conference here in Washington, and notwithstanding the opposition of the administration, it was finally announced in the newspapers of Washington that the President had abandoned his position, and when the Senator from Idaho pressed his amendment to a vote here in the Senate it was agreed to, as I recall, with only four dissenting votes. At the same time the House of Representatives had adopted a motion to allow a separate vote upon this question, which was then in conference. When put to a vote in the House of Representatives, it carried by a majority of 330 to 4. The result of that action of Congress was that on the 10th of July the State Department announced that invitations would soon be sent to foreign countries to join in the conference to be held in Washington; and they were sent during the following month.

Mr. President, I have briefly recited these facts of history for the purpose of showing that the genesis of this idea was Democratic; that it was initiated in the House of Representatives; that it was followed up in December, 1920, by the activity of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and three days thereafter was taken up by the courageous Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who finally, by a determined fight lasting over weeks and months, with Democratic support, compelled the administration to abandon its opposition to the idea and to call the disarmament conference, against which, with determination, it had set its face for many weeks.

Mr. President, I have said this much in order that the facts and the statements introduced in the address by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] this morning may not be taken as a conclusive showing of the great achievements of this administration at the disarmament conference. We are all ready to vote for the ratification of the treaty, as I understand, with possibly very few exceptions, on both sides of the aisle; but the credit should be given to the Senator from Idaho for the courageous and determined fight which he has made to compel his party to align itself with the Democratic forces of this country, which began in 1916 to insist on a disarmament conference, and which has steadily made the fight for efforts of this kind to secure peace for the world.

Mr. President, I think it is deplorable that the conference was not able to bring about land disarmament; I think it was deplorable it was only able to secure a reduction in naval armament to the extent practically of capital ships; that it was not able to make any reduction in the submarine equipment of navies; and that its efforts have been so crippled and thwarted by the opposition of special interests. Nevertheless a great step forward has been taken. We are all ready to vote for the treaty; but we want it distinctly understood that the initiative of this step was Democratic and that its great success was due finally to the courageous struggle made by the Senator from Idaho, which resulted in forcing upon an unwilling administration the calling of the disarmament conference.

I think, Mr. President, it would have been possible, if an early effort had been made, to secure not only naval disarmament but some land disarmament. Certainly the League of Nations has undertaken to bring about not only naval disarmament but land disarmament. Its progress has not been great as yet, and I noticed the Senator from Massachusetts rather gloated over the fact that it has not yet succeeded in going very far in that work. It does not, however, lie in our mouths to criticize the League of Nations for its failure to accomplish its objects. We remained out of the League of Nations, and when the Washington conference was called it was called purely to consider the problems of the Pacific Ocean and not the problems of the world. In calling the conference and in its subsequent proceedings many nations were excluded from participation. No effort was made to bring about a reduction of the great armaments of Europe.

The world to-day is not suffering from naval armament to anything like the same extent that it is suffering from land armament. To-day upon European soil there are maintained by such nations as France and Poland and Italy and Great Britain millions of men. Their numbers should be greatly reduced. One great reason why the recuperation of Europe is so slow, one great reason why rehabilitation has made such little progress in Europe to-day is because of the enormous armies which are there maintained. France, at the present time, as we have been told time and again, is maintaining an army of over 700,000 men. The German people can do nothing as they are under a most crushing defeat, struggling as they are with impossible reparations to pay, are compelled to cripple themselves still further by paying for that enormous army, a large part of which is an army of occupation on German soil.

We should, in my opinion, have cooperated with the other nations of the world in European matters. It may be all right for us to form a little combination in the waters of the Pacific Ocean to secure a peaceful settlement of possible disputes, but the great thing for the United States to do is to join with the other nations of the world for universal disarmament. The great opportunity for the United States is to join the other nations which are trying to rehabilitate Europe. It is Europe in which we are interested. Our interests in the Pacific Ocean and on the Asiatic coast are absolutely insignificant compared with our tremendous interests in Europe.

Mr. President, from what is this country suffering to-day? We are in the midst of one of the most terrible depressions which have ever afflicted us. Four or five million men are out of work; last year there was a record of 8,000 commercial failures in the United States; and there are going to be over 12,000 failures this year, the greatest number in the history of the country. We are suffering because to-day we are not able to sell our surplus products. Our copper mines in the West are still closed and tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands, of men are out of work on that account. In the cotton fields of the South there are probably five or six million bales of cotton of last year's crop still unsold in the warehouses, mortgaged for more than they will sell for; our manufacturing institutions, which have a capacity to produce $2,000,000,000 more of manufactured goods than the American people can consume, are not able to sell their surplus; they are working but 50 per cent of their capacity and are reducing the wages of their employees from quarter to quarter. Our railroads, which ought to be carrying the great commerce of the country, are scarcely able, with their greatly reduced freight and passenger traffic, to pay their fixed charges in many cases, notwithstanding the fact that freight rates and passenger rates also are exorbitant.

Mr. President, out in the section of the country where I live we are able to raise a great deal more wheat and corn and hogs and cattle and other products of agriculture than the people can consume; we should like to sell that surplus to Europe at good prices, but, as a matter of fact, for the last 18 months our prices have been on the toboggan, and the farmers of the West have been compelled to sell their cattle, compelled to sell their wheat, compelled to sell their corn at prices which do not even reimburse them for the cost of production. We have depression all over the country; we have had it for months; and we are going to have it for months longer, in spite of the little palliatives to which resort has been had. Our unfortunate condition is not due to any domestic trouble; we have all the assets in the United States to-day which we had under the eight prosperous years of the last administration.

Why are we not prosperous? We are not prosperous because our great customer, Europe, is in the slough of despond. We are doing nothing to help Europe out. Governments over there are bankrupting themselves by maintaining great armaments which they do not need, and we are making no effort at cooperation with them in bringing about a reduction.

So, I say that while some credit may be given, doubtless, to the Washington conference for the work which it has done in bringing about a little relief in the Pacific Ocean and forming a little combination there which may be called an alliance, it has done nothing practically to relieve the economic distress of this country. I do not understand how the administration, that should be not only patriotically interested but must be politically interested in the welfare and prosperity of the country, can now neglect the great opportunity of cooperating with Europe in its rehabilitation. Instead of that it devotes its energies to this comparatively small matter in the Pacific Ocean.

So, in the midst of my congratulations for the negotiation of this treaty, for which I expect to vote, I again express regret that this administration has done nothing to bring about cooperation with the nations of Europe, so that they may escape bankruptcy, so that they may rehabilitate themselves, and so that our former great customers in Europe that have made us prosperous by buying our surplus may again make us prosperous by buying our surplus which they really need.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9606) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for payment of charges due on reclamation projects, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

COMPENSATION FOR NIGHT WORK BY POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

As in legislative session,

Mr. TOWNSEND. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I assume that there will be no opposition to it. I will say, by way of explanation, that when the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration some days ago an amendment was proposed affecting the compensation of employees of the Post Office Department engaged in night work. I said at that time that I should take the matter up before the committee at the earliest opportunity. I do not know what kind of a bill to introduce to cover the matter. So I am presenting a resolution authorizing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to investigate the subject. It will not involve any expenditure, but will enable us to get at the facts; and that is what I want. The resolution is merely to form the basis for hearings before the committee for the purpose of determining the cost and other considerations which may be involved.

Mr. KING. Has not the Senator's committee authority, without a specific resolution, to consider the subject referred to?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have presented the resolution simply that the committee may have something definite upon which to work. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 259) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be, and hereby is, authorized to investigate the matter of night work by the postal employees for the purpose of determining the extent of such work and the best method for reducing it, and whether necessary night work in the Post Office Department should be compensated by shorter hours or increased pay. Such committee shall report its findings to the Senate, with such recommendations as to it may seem desirable, not later than July 1, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution, as in legislative session?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the resolution will be adopted. The subject is one which has been considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and is of pressing importance. I hope that favorable action may be taken at once on the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, what is the use of passing the resolution if the Post Office and Post Roads Committee has already considered this question? It is to authorize the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, as I understand, to consider it further. Is that the idea?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes. I stated before the Senate, as the Senator will remember, that the House committee did not consider it, and that it was not brought before our committee until after we had made our report. A statement was made then, but we were unable to determine or to be furnished with what it would cost, and what the effect would be upon the service. That was after our bill had been reported, and the report had been agreed to by our committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The committee could investigate it, though, without the passage of this resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This will enable us to have something before us upon which we can proceed to work. We have nothing before us now.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, it is not the intention to let down lightly those who refused to allow an amendment to be incorporated when it was proposed in the recent Post Office appropriation bill to do the very thing that is now sought to be done?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator asking a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ROADS, BRIDGES, AND TRAILS IN ALASKA.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will yield to me for a moment, I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, to report back favorably, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, House Joint Resolution 282, and I submit a report (No. 579) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, for the passage of which there is an emergency.

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to make a report as in legislative session. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator further asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Let it be read.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection if it does not lead to long debate. I have to leave the city at 6 o'clock, and I should like just a few moments on the treaty before leaving.

Mr. NEW. If it leads to debate, I shall withdraw it; I shall not press it at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no objection, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 282) to authorize the Secretary of War to incur obligations for construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska, said obligations to be paid from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is authorized to direct the Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska to incur obligations prior to July 1, 1922, for the construction and maintenance of roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska of not to exceed 50 per cent of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, payment of these obligations to be made from the appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask just a question?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if an explanation is desired, as it very properly should be, I will say this:

The appropriation for this work in Alaska for this year is $425,000. To carry out that work it is necessary to make contracts in the United States for the delivery of material. It has to be fabricated here and delivered there. If they are to wait until the appropriation is available, it will be too late for them to proceed with the work this season. The money will not be available until probably the 1st of July, or certainly along in June, when it would be too late for them to make the contract, get the material there, and do the work. This joint resolution has passed the House unanimously, and is recommended by the Secretary of War, by the Alaskan Road Commission, by Governor Bone, and by all who have anything to do with it. It authorizes contracts to the amount of 50 per cent only of the amount of the appropriation, in order that they may get the material there in time to work on it this season.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator remember how much the total appropriation is?

Mr. NEW. Four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the present Interior Department bill that we just passed?

Mr. NEW. Yes. The appropriation for this work is $425,000, and this joint resolution would authorize the making of contracts for material to the extent of $212,500.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This has not heretofore been found necessary with reference to the appropriations for road work in Alaska, has it?

Mr. NEW. I do not know that it has, but it is now said to be necessary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I want to know. I can very readily understand that the season being so short in Alaska, work must be begun promptly if it is to be done at all; but while I have served on the committee for many years, I do not remember that we were ever before called upon to anticipate in that way the appropriations for a fiscal year, and I was wondering what are the peculiar circumstances which suggest that course at this time.

Mr. NEW. I do not know that it was ever asked for before, but I do know that the statement made now is that they need certain fabricated material, which has to be made here in the United States and delivered there in time to be used during the working season on those roads, and this is to enable them to get it. That condition may not have existed heretofore.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course the Senator will appreciate that that is a condition that has always existed.

Mr. NEW. It may have. As to what has happened in times past, I can not say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

As in legislative session,

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of members of the Bridgeport (Conn.) Chamber of Commerce, praying for the passage of House bill 10622, authorizing the Secretaries of War and of the Navy to loan, issue, or sell surplus equipment to the Boy Scouts of America, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hebron, Amston, Leonard Bridge, and South Coventry, all in the State of Connecticut, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of 39 leading manufacturing companies of Meriden, Conn., praying for the prompt enactment of a protective tariff law based on American valuations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of Cheshire Grange, No. 23, and Ekonk Grange, No. 89, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cheshire and Moosup, respectively, in the State of Connecticut, favoring avoidance of the impending coal strike by means of conference and arbitration, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of members of Lincoln Council, No. 4, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Waterbury, Conn., favoring the passage of more stringent immigration and naturalization laws, and also the creation of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FERNALD presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wilton, Dryden, Weld, and Jay, all in the State of Maine, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMMONS presented resolutions of Nancy Carr Council, No. 29, of Durham, and General Green Council, No. 20, of Greensboro, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of North Carolina, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. WILLIS presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Chillicothe, Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill 9691, providing for the creation of Federal local option districts, etc., and for the manufacture and sale of light wines and beers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Mrs. Carrie Craig and 70 other citizens of Columbus, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution of the City Council of Fitchburg, Mass., favoring the enactment of the soldiers' compensation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the city of Holyoke, Mass., favoring modification of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to allow the manufacture and sale of beers and light wines, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7415) to correct and amend the service and military record of Herbert Langley, United States Marine Corps, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 580) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8460) to authorize the occupation and use of certain lands in Alaska by Ketchikan Post, No. 3, American Legion, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 581);

A bill (H. R. 8690) to add a certain tract of land on the island of Hawaii to the Hawaii National Park (Rept. No. 582); and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 249) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to donate and grant certain buildings in Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church (Rept. No. 583).

FORT M'HENRY (MD.) RESERVATION.

Mr. FRANCE introduced a bill (S. 3349) to amend the act approved May 26, 1914, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and City Council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside," to provide for the restoration of Fort McHenry and its permanent preservation as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key, for the appropriation of the necessary funds, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRANCE. I submit a statement explanatory of the bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, together with the bill, and both referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill and accompanying statement were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

A bill (S. 3349) to amend the act approved May 26, 1914, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside"; to provide for the restoration of Fort McHenry and its permanent preservation as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key, for the appropriation of the necessary funds, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved May 26, 1914, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Fort McHenry Military Reservation, in the State of Maryland, to the mayor and city council of Baltimore, a municipal corporation of the State of Maryland, making certain provisions in connection therewith, providing access to and from the site of the new immigration station heretofore set aside," be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, so soon as it may no longer be needed for uses and needs growing out of the recent war, to begin the restoration of Fort McHenry, in the State of Maryland, now occupied and used as a military reservation, including the restoration of the old Fort McHenry proper to the condition in which it was on the 1st of September, 1814, and to place the whole of said military reservation in such a condition as would make it suitable for preservation permanently as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star-Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key; and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, further authorized and directed, as are his successors, to hold the said Fort McHenry in perpetuity as a military reservation, national park, and memorial, and to maintain it as such, except that part mentioned in section 3 hereof and that part now in use by the Department of Commerce for a light and fog-signal station under revokable license from the War Department with the maintenance of the electric lights thereto, the said reservation to be maintained as a national public park, subject to such regulations as may from time to time be issued by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the citizens of Baltimore City and of the State of Maryland shall be given as free and full access to and use of said national park as they would enjoy if this were a part of the park system of Baltimore City.

"That any and all repairs, improvements, changes, and alterations in the grounds, buildings, and other appurtenances to the reservation shall be made only according to detailed plans, which shall be approved by the Secretary of War, and all such repairs, improvements, or alterations shall be made at the expense of the United States, and all such improvements, together with the reservation itself, shall become and remain permanently the property of the United States: Provided, That permission is hereby granted the Secretary of the Treasury to use permanently a strip of land 60 feet wide belonging to said fort grounds, beginning at the north corner of the present grounds of the fort and extending south 63 degrees 30 minutes east, 650 feet to the south corner of the site set aside for the immigration station at Baltimore, said strip of land being located along the northwest boundary of the land ceded to the Baltimore Dry Dock Co. and the land of the said immigration station, the same to be used, if so desired, in lieu of acquiring, by purchase or condemnation, any of the lands of the dry-dock company so that the Secretary of the Treasury may, in connection with land acquired from the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., have access to and from said immigration station and grounds over the right of way so acquired to the city streets and railroads beyond, the Secretary of the Treasury to have the same power to construct, contract for, and arrange for railroad and other facilities upon said outlet as fully as provided in the act, approved March 4, 1913, setting aside a site for an immigration station and providing for an outlet therefrom: Provided, however, That if the Secretary of the Treasury accepts and makes use of said strip of land for the purposes aforesaid the War Department shall have equal use of the railroad track and other roads constructed over which to reach the city streets and railroads beyond from the other parts of the fort grounds: Provided further, That the Secretary of War may, in case of a national emergency or war, temporarily and only for the period of such war close the said military reservation and use it, if he shall deem it to be necessary, for military purposes.

"That there be, and hereby is, authorized to be appropriated out of funds in the Treasury of the United States heretofore made available but not appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for use by the Secretary of War in the restoration of said military reservation, and for other purposes consistent with this act; and, further, that there be, and hereby is, appropriated $10,000 annually for the maintenance and care of the reservation."

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.

[From the original manuscript of Francis Scott Key.]

O say can you see by the dawn's early light
What so proudly we hail'd at the twilight's last gleaming,
Whose broad stripes and bright stars through the perilous fight
O'er the ramparts we watch'd, were so gallantly streaming?
And the rocket's red glare, the bomb bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there.
O say does that Star-Spangled Banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?

On the shore dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
What is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, half conceals, half discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected now shines in the stream,
'Tis the Star-Spangled Banner—O long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

And where is that band who so vauntingly swore
That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion
A home and a country should leave us no more?
Their blood has washed out their foul footstep's pollution.
No refuge could save the hireling and slave
From the terror of flight or the gloom of the grave,
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph doth wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

O thus be it ever when freemen shall stand
Between their lov'd home and the war's desolation!
Blest with vict'ry and peace may the heav'n-rescued land
Praise the power that hath made and preserv'd us a Nation!
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto—"In God is our trust."
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

[From a London newspaper of June 17, 1814.]

It is understood that the grand expedition preparing at Bordeaux for America, under the gallant Lord Hill, is destined for the Chesapeake direct. Our little army in Canada will at the same time be directed to make a movement in the direction of the Susquehanna, and both armies will, therefore, in all probability meet at Washington, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. The seat of the American Government, but more particularly Baltimore, is to be the main object of attack. In the diplomatic circles it is also rumored that our naval and military commanders on the American station have no power to conclude any armistice or suspension of arms. They carry with them certain terms, which will be offered to the American Government at the point of the bayonet. The terms are not made public, but there is reason to believe that America will be left in a much worse situation as a naval and commercial power than she was at the commencement of the war.

FORT McHENRY.

The 1st of September, 1814, saw the city of Washington burned, the handful of American warships driven to port by force of superior numbers, the Atlantic coast from Maine to Louisiana open to attack, and the fate of the Union in the balance. It was then that Fort McHenry stood firm against the invader, redeemed our eastern seaboard, and delivered the Federal Government from serious disaster or utter ruin.

Yet, great as were the services which Fort McHenry rendered in that fateful month and year, our once feeble Government, now become the most powerful in the world, has done but little to commemorate the spot which inspired "The Star-Spangled Banner," a spot which not only rescued the young Republic in an hour of grave difficulty, but brought the war with Britain to a close and ushered in a century of peace.

Apparently forgotten by the Government are the patriots who proved their claim to liberty by the performance of deeds; neglected are the grounds of Fort McHenry, sacred to the holiest traditions of the American people.

The question for the people of America to answer is, Shall these ramparts go to ruin, shall modern buildings encroach upon the soil of this sacred ground? Surely a patriotic people will not permit these battlements that once repelled a victorious invader to be thus dishonored. Let us restore them as they were, so that coming generations may see them with the eyes of those gallant first defenders, or else let us level them to the earth.

In the two and a half years of war preceding the defense of Fort McHenry, scores of the fastest sailing vessels afloat had set forth from beside its parapets. Eluding the frigates that once impressed American seamen, these light-armed clipper ships pursued and captured enemy merchantmen by the hundred, prisoners by the thousands, and booty that ran into millions.

To the enemy the waters of the Chesapeake had now become little better than a "nest of privateers and pirates." It was clear to them that the Chesapeake must be rid of these pests, the Federal Capital captured, and Baltimore forced to pay for damage done and be made the point of a wedge to drive the North and South apart. Then Fredericksburg and Richmond could be threatened or captured on the south, Philadelphia and New York on the north.

The British were driving south from Canada and were at Plattsburg. They proposed to sweep down and make a junction with the 9,000 troops quartered on the fleet in the Chesapeake. Then by uniting their forces from Lake Champlain and the Chesapeake and having neutralized New England, they would coerce and subjugate America once again. To quote from an officer with the attacking British fleet:

"A large proportion of the peninsular army would be transported to the other side of the Atlantic. The war would be carried on with vigor and no terms would be listened to except and as a British general should dictate in the Republic Senate House." (G. R. Gleig-Narrative of Campaigns, 1812–1821.)

Washington had fallen easily, a body of our Regulars and militia had been defeated at Bladensburg, and the Chesapeake coast line was at the mercy of the "redcoats"—all but that section protected by the guns of Fort McHenry and troops gathered in the vicinity. To be pitted against our soldiers were Continental veterans fresh from their victories on the Continent of Europe. In the Chesapeake were not only Wellington's Invincibles but Nelson's marines, distinguished at Trafalgar and the Battle of the Nile.

The invading fleet numbered some 50 sail—a large proportion of them classed as men-of-war and frigates of the line. Against this armada with its troop transports, America could oppose nothing afloat.

The hope of the Middle Atlantic seaboard and perhaps the Union itself lay in the city of Baltimore, and the hope of Baltimore lay in the garrison and guns of Fort McHenry and such untrained troops as could be mustered for other land defenses.

No wonder that Gen. Sir Robert Ross, who commanded the British troops, declared that he would "eat his supper in Baltimore" subsequent to his first day on land. Nothing seemed to him more certain even if, as he said, "it rains militia." Baltimore was picked to be his winter headquarters and a logical base for further operations north, south, or west.

Early on Sunday morning, September 11, the alarm was sounded through the streets of Baltimore. The British fleet had entered the Patapsco River. The cannon boomed on the courthouse plaza, summoning the militia to arms.

The defensive force and equipment of Fort McHenry were supplied largely by the citizens of the beleaguered port. Regardless of a blazing sun, men and women toiled with pick and shovel to throw up breastworks at every approach to the city and its chief reliance, Fort McHenry. Maj. Gen. Samuel Smith was in command of the militia, and under him was Brigadier General Stricker. Sailors, lacking ships to go to sea, were converted into land forces under the brilliant Commodore John Rodgers.

Before dawn had streaked the sky on the 12th of September the British were astir, and boat after boat carried men and arms to North Point, where now stands Fort Howard. General Ross, who had won his laurels in Holland, Egypt, and the peninsula, took command. At his side was Rear Admiral Cockburn, who was hated for his plundering of defenseless villages. Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane, successor of Admiral Warren as commander in chief of the British forces in America, remained on his flagship and in person supervised the plans for the attack by water.

The American commanders sent forward outposts to engage the British, and scarcely were the latter assembled on shore when General Ross fell. Tradition has it that two youths, perched in a tree, shot him when he passed within range of their rifles. As he was carried to the rear, he demanded that he be covered, for fear the knowledge of his fall would reach his men and dismay them. Shortly after giving these directions he lost consciousness, and died in the arms of his aid, Sir Duncan McDougall.

The encounter at North Point was that phase of the engagements which in their entirety might be called the Battle of Baltimore, the attack upon Fort McHenry being the crucial or decisive action. The first encounter, wholly on land, was on the afternoon of the 12th. The British stormed the American earthworks, but were checked by a fire of shot, slugs, scrap iron, and nails. The lines of both armies swayed back and forth, with victory smiling first on one side and then on the other. The British lost 600 that day, the Americans 150.

At dusk a great storm broke and the fighting halted. At daybreak the rain ceased and the battle began anew, the British commander, Brooke, who had succeeded Ross, ordering his men forward to avenge the setbacks of the day before.

The fleet was all commotion, for an officer from Colonel Brooke's staff had urgently requested Admiral Cochrane to open the bombardment of Fort McHenry, which, if successful, would seal the fate of the city. Soon the ships weighed anchor and, sailing up the Patapsco, got into battle formation 2¼ miles off the fort. The decks were stripped, the bomb and rocket vessels opened their fire, and 16 ships hurled bombs, rockets, and solid shot into the ramparts. The garrison of the fort—1,000 Volunteers and Regulars—was under Col. George Armistead. Armistead unmasked his batteries and directed a brisk fire, but the range of his guns and mortars fell short of the ships. This was disheartening, and his anxiety was not lessened when a 24-pounder in the southeast bastion was demolished by an exploding bomb, mortally wounding an officer and several of the cannoneers.

Observing the confusion in the fort, Admiral Cochrane signaled three of his bomb vessels, and they moved closer to the ramparts to hasten the victory. Armistead seized his opportunity, and ordered a well-directed fire, and his wide-mouthed cannon wrought havoc on the decks of the three, one of them, the Erebus, being disabled.

In the shadow of the British fleet that day and night rode the American vessel Minden, flying a flag of truce, and used by American agents in the exchange of prisoners. While the bombardment raged, none watched with more anxiety than Francis Scott Key. He had gone to the British fleet in the Potomac to seek the release of an old friend, Dr. William Beanes, a physician seized on charges of taking up arms against British stragglers. Key obtained his release, but on the eve of the operations both were transferred to the Minden, which was detained under a guard of marines until the British plans should be carried out.

From the decks of the cartel ship Key and his companions watched every belch of the cannon. Midnight came and 1,250 men, equipped with scaling ladders, dropped from the fleet into barges, with the intention of surprising from the rear the defenders of the fort.

How the hearts of the patriots beat as, helpless to give the alarm, they saw this strategy under way with every prospect of success. In attempting to effect a landing, however, the expeditionary force struck lights and these lights cost it a possible victory. The defenders promptly set fire to a haystack and, as its glow revealed the barges, Fort McHenry and the redouts shook with the salvos of the guns. The 6-gun battery under Sailing Master Webster, which the British had planned to take by storm, was served that midnight coolly and quickly by a little group of cannoneers, whose valor was sustained by the thought of home and country, and to whom Colonel Armistead afterwards said he was "persuaded the country was much indebted for the final repulse of the enemy." Many of the landing party were killed and others wounded; two boats were sunk and the survivors made back to the fleet. The defenders lost 4 killed and 24 wounded. The master stroke had been delivered and had failed; 1,800 shells had been thrown into the fortifications, but no white flag flew from the great staff on the ramparts.

Sunset had cast a leaden gloom upon the spirits of the defenders, but dawn found their hopes high and the invader beaten off. That night, with the fate of the city and perhaps the existence of the Union hanging by a thread, Key paced the deck of the Minden, and each shell that sped screaming from the ships was a stab at his heart, a challenge to all he held dear. When the first blush of morning tinged the sky Key gazed toward the battlements and with straining eyes beheld the Stars and Stripes, scarred, but still defiantly floating. The cannonading had ceased; the troops, many of them wounded, had been conveyed to the ships and the fleet was setting its sails. The joy of Key was unrestrained, and from his soul there came "the Star-Spangled Banner." He put into words the exaltation which coursed through the veins of every loyal American as the tidings of the triumph spread. Conceived in the midst of shrieking shell and of bursting bomb, the national anthem of America was born in victory. The battle had been fought and freemen had dealt a crushing blow to the invader.

How brief, though momentous, the message which went by courier to Washington from General Smith:

HEADQUARTERS, HAMPSTEAD HILL, BALTIMORE,
September 14, 1814—10 a. m.

Hon. JAMES MONROE,
Acting Secretary of War.

SIR: I have the honor of informing you that the enemy, after an unsuccessful attempt both by land and water on this place, appear to be retiring.

We have a force hanging on their rear.

I have the honor to be,
Your obedient servant,

S. SMITH,
Major General, Commanding.

P. S.—The enemy's vessels in the Patapsco are all under way going down the river. I have good reason to believe that General Ross is mortally wounded.

The attack on Fort McHenry in September, 1814, marked the last major engagement of the war prior to the signing of the treaty of peace at Ghent. For some weeks commissioners from the United States and Great Britain had been discussing terms of peace at Ghent, but the Americans would not accede to the British demands and agreement seemed impossible. When, however, the news of British defeats at Plattsburg and at Baltimore reached London the British ministry quickly yielded the points most objectionable to the Americans and the treaty was signed.

To the citizens who came to wander through the redoubts in the days that followed, how wonderfully complete seemed this impregnable fortress! How impassible appeared the moat of murky waters between the outer ramparts and the star fort walls; how massive the masonry; how impressive the thick wooden doors with their studded surface; how doughty the cast-iron cannon in grim silhouette against the sky! The fort, conceived in fear and born in hope, now lived a life of love—a love that had its greatest expression in the World War, when cannon mounts, feeble with age, stood watch over the wounded brought from the battle fields of Europe. To-day, more than 100 years after the supreme effort of 1814, though apparently neglected by the Government it saved, the old fort smiles to the sky, serenely awaiting the final day of decay, unhonored but not unsung.

The time has come for our great Federal Government to show an active interest in the fact that Fort McHenry marks the spot where a decisive blow in the War of 1812 was struck; where Francis Scott Key was inspired by the valor of its defenders to write America's national anthem, "the Star-Spangled Banner." In a word, Fort McHenry, standing as a silent sentinel for a century at the approaches to Baltimore, a uniquely historic point on the Atlantic coast, and most celebrated in the songs of the Nation, should be recognized by the Government it saved.

What finer tribute could we pay those immortals whose blood was spilled at the altar of liberty in 1776, in 1812, and in 1918 than by restoring Fort McHenry to its condition in those early days of the Republic, with the ancient cannon once more set up, by removing unsightly buildings from its grounds, and by dedicating it as a national park to the carrying out of the ideals of Americanization? We have done this at Yorktown, for example; why not at Fort McHenry? On the grounds of Fort McHenry is the immigration station of the Government, which will receive new citizens who enter America through the port of Baltimore. What more living lesson in democracy could these be given than to be welcomed on ground once trodden by patriots and sacred to the traditions of liberty achieved through the shedding of blood?

It is to such an ideal that this booklet is dedicated: That Fort McHenry through its restoration may be honored by the Government which it saved in 1814, thus furnishing a splendid inspiration of patriotism for our children and our children's children. It has been prepared, further, with the thought foremost in the minds of the undersigned citizens of the United States that Fort McHenry ever may serve as a beacon light of our liberty, that loyalty may be intensified at a time when loyalty is a vital need and love of country may be enshrined in the heart of every native-born and adopted son and daughter of the United States of America. In doing this we shall have carried out the prayer of the author of our national anthem:

O! thus be it ever when freemen shall stand
Between their lov'd home and the war's desolation!
Blest with vict'ry and peace may the heav'n-rescued land
Praise the power that hath made and preserv'd us a Nation!

ESTIMATED COST OF RESTORATION OF FORT MCHENRY.

PLAN.

The estimate is based upon the cost of restoring Fort McHenry to the condition it was in at the time of its bombardment by the British, as shown by plans on file in the district engineer office, customhouse, Baltimore, Md. Certain buildings which were not in existence in 1814 would be left standing and used in connection with the maintenance of the reservation as a park.

The following structures would remain in place:

Buildings of immigration station.
Star Fort with buildings therein.
Upper water battery.
Lower water battery.
Building No. 22, to be remodeled.
Buildings Nos. 51, 60, 61, and 62, to be used as quarters for superintendent and laborers.
Building No. 75, old magazine.
Building No. 77, chapel.
Buildings Nos. 94 and 95, for storehouse and garage.

It is proposed to use the following portions of the existing road system:

(a) All concrete roads.

(b) Main macadam road through center of grounds (Fort Avenue, extended) with both branches leading from junction northeast of Star Fort to the sea wall.

(c) The macadam road leading from the axial road toward the wharf.

(d) The macadamized portion of the road leading southwest from the entrance and along the sea wall.

The present cinder road around the sea wall would be replaced by macadam, 14 feet wide. Portions of macadam and cinder roads not utilized under the scheme of restoration would be removed and the existing roads straightened in places.

The present wooden building at the entrance to the fort would be removed and replaced by ornamental iron gates.

COST.

It is estimated that the buildings can be removed and the pillars and foundations taken out of the ground for the value of the salvaged materials therein. The sea wall is in good condition and requires few repairs.

STAR FORT.

Painting, new roofs, and miscellaneous repairs to six buildings, at $700 each	$4,200
Sodding, stone coping, roads, and walks	2,000
Repairs to outside brick wall	1,000

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 3350) for the relief of Alice M. Gorman; and

A bill (S. 3351) for the relief of G. Dare Hopkins; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 3352) to remove the charge of desertion against William H. Riddensdale; and

A bill (S. 3353) to remove the charge of desertion against Henry C. Mowry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STANLEY:

A bill (S. 3354) granting an increase of pension to John S. Cisco; to the Committee on Pensions.

CHIPPEWA INDIAN AGREEMENTS.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 260), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate be, and it is hereby, instructed to investigate the following matters and submit its findings to the Senate at the earliest practicable day:

First, in what respects, if any, the agreements entered into by the United States with the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota pursuant to the authority contained in the act of January 14, 1889 (25 Stats. L. 642), have been violated, disregarded, or ignored by the United States, its officers and agents.

Second, what property, if any, conveyed to the United States in trust under said agreements has been disposed of by the United States, its officers and agents, in violation of the terms and provisions of said agreements and to the loss and injury of said Indians and for which the United States is or may become liable.

Third, what property, if any, ceded to the United States in trust under said agreements has been disposed of by the United States in violation of the terms of said agreements without any consideration, or without adequate consideration, to the Indians, can be recovered, and the proper steps to be taken.

Fourth. What funds, if any, received from the disposition of property ceded to the United States in trust under said agreements have been appropriated or expended by the United States in violation of the terms and provisions of the agreements creating said trust, and to what extent the United States has become liable therefor.

Fifth. What laws have been enacted by Congress since said agreements were entered into that are in violation of the terms and provisions of said agreements and have caused or will cause loss or injury to said Indians if carried into execution.

Sixth. What legislation, if any, is now pending before Congress that would, if enacted into law, be in violation of said agreements and would cause loss and injury to said Indians and create a claim or claims against the United States.

Seventh. To what extent, if any, Congress can, independent of said Indians and without their assent being had or obtained, lawfully change, alter, or amend said agreements to the financial loss and injury of said Indians without creating a legal liability against the United States for the resulting loss.

Eighth. That at said inquiry the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota shall be permitted to appear through a representative of their own selection and present the claims of said Indians.

And said committee is further instructed to advise the Senate what action, if any, is necessary to be taken to compose the controversy between the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and the Government of the United States and to adjust their differences upon honorable terms, and if legislation is necessary to submit a draft thereof.

NAVAL ARMAMENT TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the city at 6 o'clock, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate for about 5 or 10 minutes on the pending treaty.

I am very glad to hear the announcement by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska and other Senators on the other side of the Chamber that they are prepared, practically unanimously, to vote to ratify this treaty. I congratulate them. The Senator from Nebraska, however, while he is perfectly willing that the treaty shall be ratified, and thinks it is something of an accomplishment, wishes to place the credit where it belongs, and does not want the credit to go to the President.

Mr. President, let us ratify the treaty. Let history take care of the credit. I am perfectly willing to give to the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] all the credit that he is entitled to, and I concede that he is entitled to credit. I am perfectly willing to give the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] the credit of advocating the resolution for calling a disarmament conference; but when it is stated that the President was opposed to disarmament, I beg to disagree with the distinguished Senator. I know that he was not opposed to it. I know that it was always his idea to call a conference, hoping that something like the treaty which has been submitted to the Senate would come out of that conference; and he, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] says, repeatedly said so. It may be that he thought that a resolution from Congress requiring him to call a conference was not proper; but whatever he may have thought about that I do not know. I know that he believed in such a conference and intended to call such a conference.

It is said that under the covenant of the League of Nations such a conference was intended and might have accomplished greater things. Mr. President, I recall the speeches of distinguished statesmen in the British House of Commons and the House of Lords in 1919 when the subject of a proposed League of Nations was under discussion, and I think also in 1918. Those distinguished statesmen considered that a dream not to be realized, except possibly in the far-distant future. They had little confidence that it could be realized; and what has the League of Nations done toward disarmament? It has done nothing. Had the President of the United States called together all of the nations of the world, or of Europe, to undertake a general disarmament of land and naval forces, he would not have succeeded.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said that France refused to consent to a reduction of her army because we refused to protect France against Germany. It is against our traditional policy to enter into such an alliance to go to war to protect any nation's independence; but it is not alone Germany that France is afraid of. Is France going to disarm her land forces with Russia looming in the distance, disturbed and uncertain? Have we forgotten the raid Russia made on Poland only in 1920, and came near succeeding? That disturbed France much more than disarmed Germany has disturbed her.

Mr. President, I am very glad that we are all united, or are going to be, in a vote for this treaty. I consider it a great accomplishment, the first step ever taken for real limitation of armament. I hope it will go further as time goes on, and that we may be enabled to get an agreement for the limitation of land armament; but that we have not been able to get that does not detract from the credit of this work, or its advantage to the world. I have never known a step taken which meets my hearty, enthusiastic support more than this, because I believe it to be a step in the right direction.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] says we have done nothing for the disturbed financial condition in our own country; that we are passing through a depression unequaled in the history of the country; and that we have done nothing to alleviate it. I think the Senator is mistaken. Much has been done. I am aware that all the relief can not be accomplished by legislation. The actual working out of economic laws must do much; but much has been done in the last six months. This Congress, realizing the critical condition of the agricultural communities, passed a bill authorizing the War Finance Corporation to extend aid to farmers, and $308,000,000 have been advanced in aid of marketing farm products in this country since the 1st of September last, and the prices of farm products all over the country have very greatly increased. In the year 1921 we exported more wheat and more of many of the leading farm products than we did in 1920. We have done a great deal to restore confidence, to encourage agriculture, and to encourage business, and while we can not do everything by legislation, undoubtedly it has had a great effect in the restoration of confidence and in the betterment of business conditions throughout the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, some of these "pleas in confession and avoidance" made on the other side of the Chamber would be very amusing if they were not illustrations of "lame and impotent conclusions." The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has just said that the League of Nations has done nothing. The junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] some time ago made a rather convincing statement of what the League of Nations had done.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I said it had done nothing toward disarmament.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, toward disarmament. Neither has anybody else, except toward disarmament at sea, and the danger of war is not coming from a sea power at all. It never has. It has come from armed forces on land, and when the Senator is boasting about this little halfway measure he becomes amusing. It is good as far as it goes, and I voted for it, and I am glad I was able to do so, because it was a new point of departure toward disarmament on the element where armament can be used in war. France has not disarmed, and Italy has not disarmed. The only parts of the world which have disarmed are the two great English-speaking powers, the United States and Great Britain, and they did not do it in consequence of this conference held at Washington, but each one proceeded to reduce land forces on its own account, because of their magnificent common sense, which they have illustrated in the past and are illustrating better now than any other peoples on the face of the globe; the magnificent common sense which declines to follow militarists and other people in the preachment of the doctrine that you must in time of peace be always preparing for war.

We have, upon the contrary, taught the doctrine that in times of peace we should prepare for more peace, and we have preferred, on the other side of the water and on this side of the water as well, with magnificent common sense to strain our muscles to the breaking point, if necessary, when danger and war came, rather than to keep our people bowed down all the time during peace by immense burdens in preparation for war, which comes about once every twenty-odd years in our history and a great war once in about 15 years in Great Britain's history.

With what poor grace it comes from a man who was one of those who cut off the right arm of the League of Nations now to glory in the fact that the League of Nations can not do as much as otherwise it might have done, because when he and others kept us out of it they did cut off the right arm, and it has been fighting with nothing but one arm since; but it has kept down a war between Italy and Yugoslavia incidentally, and, incidentally, it has kept down a war between Poland and Germany about Silesia, besides all the numberless other things recited by the Senator from Texas in his very able speech.

Mr. President, I have stood by these treaties; I have stood by them under difficulties. I believe that the four-power treaty is an alliance to keep the peace in a part of the world upon some subjects of controversy. I believed the League of Nations was an alliance between all the powers of the world of any consideration to keep the peace everywhere upon all subjects. I believe that there was behind each one of them latent force, just as there is behind the judgment of a justice of the peace or the decree of a chancery court latent force. If anybody resists the judgment or the decree, the constable or the sheriff will be there. If anybody resists the sheriff or the constable, the posse comitatus will be there, and if anybody resists the posse comitatus the military will be there.

So behind the four-power treaty and behind the covenant of the League of Nations there stood a force which everybody knew stood there half revealed but present to enforce the decree, first, in public opinion; second, in economic measures; third, in moral force; and, fourth and last, if necessary, in physical force.

I have never made any disguise of it. I said upon the floor of the Senate once that I had never been idiot or fool enough to think that any decree of any court of justice, national or international, would amount to the paper upon which it was written unless the criminal was afraid that the decree could be enforced. Of course, force may be in the background; it may be in the remote background; it may depend upon the fact that everybody in the council of the League of Nations, or all four of these four powers parties to this treaty, shall vote unanimously. It may be true that if one of them does not join in the decree, that one will not be bound to use any force. It may be true that even if the representative commissioner advises his country to use force, its legislative power may decline to do it; but still there is in the mind and imagination of the criminal nation, as in the mind of every criminal individual, the idea that force is possible, and it is the possibility and the fear of the use of force that keeps the peace among those of bad will.

If there had to be a fight in order to enforce every judgment of a justice of the peace or every decree of a chancery court, civilization would be in anarchy; but the criminal does not fight. He surrenders, or he becomes a fugitive from justice. He takes himself somehow out of the fighting arena, because he knows that the possibility of fight is there, and the possibility of a fight in which he is a woeful minority and the balance of the civilized world is a magnificent majority. That is all about that.

With what poor grace does such an argument come from any man who poisoned the League of Nations, or attempted to poison it, with reservations, emasculating it; a man who did not even have the courage to come out and seize a bludgeon, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had the courage to do, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] had the courage to do, and say, "I will have none of it; I will kill it," but who at that time pretended to be in favor of it with certain "modifications" and "limitations" which would render it inoperative, which would emasculate it, in other words. He and all the others of his ilk of that day and in that fight thought poisoning a surer and safer way of killing than bludgeoning—poisoning under pretense of administering helpful medicine.

The Senator from Minnesota was one of that holy poison squad. He did not even belong to the buldgeon squad, which at least fought in the open, representatives of frank barbarism, who did not intend to be bound by any sort of a fool covenant to keep the peace. He did not even belong to that crowd. There was at least courage in that bludgeon squad's methods—barbarous courage, uncivilized courage, lacking in vision, lacking in sympathy with poets' dreams and prophets' predictions, but at least courage and no pretense of loving the thing they killed. I said during the debate on that subject that that was the difference between the two.

So, in connection with the four-power treaty, there has been an attempt to poison it by reservations and amendments "with intent to kill." Poison is not the most respectable form of murder. If you want to kill a thing kill it outright, do not poison it. They attempted to poison the League of Nations and failed, but thereby weakened it by keeping the greatest country in the world in potential power out of it. Now, for God's sake, do not come here and talk about the League of Nations having "done nothing." Nobody contends that it has done as much as it might have done if we had been members of it.

Let me say this now, Mr. President, the man who takes to his soul the unction that the League of Nations, as far as the United States are concerned, is dead, is playing the part of the ostrich, with his head in the sand. It will never be dead. The United States will come into it, whether as a member or an outside auxiliary, and she is beginning the auxiliary work now through the four-power treaty, and denying it while she is doing it. Just as surely will she begin to cooperate with it as a member or as an auxiliary as that truth is truth, and God is love, and love is peace, and peace is progress, and progress is civilization. If those things be not true, then you may give up all fear on one side and all hope upon the other of anything like the League of Nations; but as long as those things are true and as long as God reigns and as long as it is insane and foolish for men to go at one another's throats to settle a controversy which they might settle as ordinary controversies within a nation are settled, just as long as those eternally true things are true, the hope will exist in the mind of this generation, and the certainty in the mind of some generation, of a League of Nations, or something very much like it.

There is just one thing that legislatures can not do, that public opinion can not do, that elections can not do, and that is to stop the growth of a divine principle, and the divine principle here is the principle of peace on earth to men of good will. It is coming. The little cheeping voice of a Senator here and there, whether from Minnesota or from somewhere else, will have no more effect upon it than shooting peas out of an old-fashioned muzzle-loading shotgun could have upon the rock of Gibraltar.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield in a moment. There is this difference, however. The rock of Gibraltar is a stationary thing, and if we could shoot peas at it long enough and often enough and enough peas, we could reduce it; but this is a growing, progressive principle, spelling the progress of civilization, and therefore it can not be killed; it has life and resistance inside of it.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have very great regard for the courage, the candor, and the sincerity of the Senator from Mississippi. Therefore I am led to ask him if he believes that the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations will remain a political issue in the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just as surely as God's created sun rises, and just as surely as God's begotten Son, the Prince of Peace, was born.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator believes that the party to which he belongs will continue to advocate the entrance of the United States into the League of Nations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it does not, though I think it will, some other party will arise which will do so, because this sort of an idea and this sort of principle can not be killed by politics or by anything else.

Mr. BORAH. How can we have it as a political issue when one party is going in at the front door and the other at the back door?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Its representatives and those of the other party upon this floor and upon the floor at the other end of the Capitol go in one door and out the next, and then swap partners and reverse doors, reminding me of an old-time country dance when the favorite figure that the darky called out while he was playing his fiddle was, "Swap partners." But the principle remains there and the people remain there, and human intellect and conscience more and more informed from day to day are there to operate upon the subject matter.

Now, the politicians have said that the League of Nations was defeated here at the last election. They say that is what beat Wilson. I can give 86 reasons why Wilson or his party was beaten, 85 of which have nothing in the world to do with the League of Nations. One was an Irish-American lobby in the city of Washington opposing the League of Nations, just as they have opposed the four-power treaty, because they do not want the United States to enter into any friendly agreement with Great Britain, hoping some day for war between the two to furnish "Ireland's opportunity." I wonder when patriotic and real and exclusive Americans will wake up to that obvious and dangerous fact?

Another was the secret ballot of the German-Americans who were mad because Wilson had dared to make war upon the Kaiser.

Another was the great universal principle of "the swing of the pendulum." You can not keep any people exalted to a very high stage of altruism and self-sacrifice for very many years at a time. Ours had been kept up there during the war period and naturally reaction set in right after the war.

Another reason was the natural-born fools. The natural-born fool thinks that you can turn 100,000,000 people in a state of peace into a people with 4,000,000 soldiers, and that they ought not to cost anything. When the natural-born fool found that taxes had to be levied in order to pay for the 4,000,000 soldiers and all the munitions of war and transportation and everything else incidental to war, he naturally got mad with the party in power that created the necessity for levying the taxes. I say, naturally—I mean, of course, naturally for him. The fellow was really astonished after having helped to eat his pie to find two things; first, that it was gone; and, secondly, that it had to be paid for. His name was Legion.

Those are three or four reasons I have given. I shall not give the other 81, but if any of you call on me in private I will give the other 81 reasons. The League of Nations had almost nothing in the world to do with it. The main thing that had to do with it was "the swing of the pendulum."

I was about to add that it is peculiar to a pendulum that when it swings one way it swings back, but it is also peculiar that it starts back on the original route a little bit later on. Of course, I am not going to be led off into what I imagine my genial friend from Idaho intended me to be led off into when he interrupted me, a discussion of how my good party colleagues got out of one door and then came back through the same door, while his colleagues were going into the door and then coming back out the same door.

I am not going into that any more. It was a lamentable spectacle and the whole American people on both sides witnessed it. The fiddler cried, "Change your partners," and you changed your partners. But, revenons a nos moutons—the League of Nations.

It was not a political issue at all, but a moral and ethical issue—its aim keeping the peace of the world, guaranteeing the peace of the world, stopping the insanity of jumping at one another's throats whenever there is a controversy, instead of seeking some tribunal to sit in fairness upon the controversy, adjudge it, and make a decree, with public opinion to enforce the decree, and if needful an armed public opinion—an amphictyonic council of the civilized world not only to decree but to enforce peace.

Mr. President, I hope to live to see the day—I shall be out of politics then—when these United States will agree that as far as they are concerned they will leave every controversy between them and any other nation to fair arbitral determination of some sort, somehow. Perhaps I shall not, because I am 68 now, and I do not hope to live beyond the Scriptural age of man, but whether I live to see it or not, somebody will live to see the time when man will wonder, when woman will wonder that there ever was a state of barbarism under which nations, of the white race at any rate, would fly at one another's throats in order to settle a controversy that might be settled without bloodshed.

But I did not rise to make a speech upon the general subject. I rose merely to call attention to the position of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] who, after having cut off the right arm of the League of Nations, then comes here and gloats upon the fact that it has not fought as well without its right arm as perhaps it could have fought with it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], as well as a number of other Senators during the discussion to-day, alluded to the League of Nations and to its achievements or to its lack of achievements. Reference has also been made to the admirable address delivered on the 5th day of October, 1921, by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] upon the work of the League of Nations. In the last two or three pages of that address is found a résumé of its accomplishments. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in the regular 8-point type, the paragraphs which I have marked.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

SUMMARY.

"Reviewing this account of the league, what are the points that impress us most?

"First. For nearly two years an organization embracing nearly all the civilized nations, comprising a billion four hundred million of the billion seven hundred million people on the globe, has been discharging functions of the highest importance under the treaty which settled the affairs of the earth at the conclusion of a universal war, arranging differences and restraining hostilities, which uncomposed might have imperiled the peace of mankind—interchanging views on subjects essential to world harmony and world progress—establishing technical bodies combining the best thought of the earth on objects of common interest and concern, such as international law, armament, health, finance, labor, relief work, cooperation with Red Cross, proper administration of territories changing hands as a result of war, statistics, conditions of transit and travel, passport facilities, repatriation of prisoners, the white-slave trade, the trade in opium and other dangerous drugs, and so forth.

"Clearly it is history's first example of definite and harmonious cooperation among so many nations of the world for so long a time on so large a scale and with such practical and far-reaching results.

"Second. The creation by the league of the Permament Court of International Justice is a step of first magnitude toward the peaceful settlement of international disputes. On the committee which the league designated to frame this court sat some of the foremost jurists of the world, including Elihu Root, of the United States. The judges elected by the league to preside in this court are noted experts in international law, including John Bassett Moore, of the United States. The Hague peace conferences of 1899 and 1907, which were recognized as the most notable attempts toward permanent peace for mankind that had yet been made, put forth every effort to create a world court to administer matters within the scope of international law as the fundamental, initial step toward the triumph of justice over force in world affairs, but both conferences failed. What they failed to do the league has accomplished.

"Third. For nearly two years the league has supervised the government of the territories of the Saar Basin and free city of Danzig, handling problems of the most delicate nature, keeping in view the interests of the inhabitants and the purposes to which these districts were devoted by the treaty of Versailles It is executing with efficiency various other duties assigned it by the peace treaties, including the supervision of international rivers, protection of minorities in certain countries, and so forth.

"Fourth. It has settled the controversy between Sweden and Finland over the Aaland Islands, showing such thoroughness and fairness and such consideration for all concerned as to enhance its position as peacemaker in the eyes of the world.

"Fifth. While it has not as yet reached a final decision in the dispute between Lithuania and Poland, the fact that both countries ceased hostilities when the league was appealed to and refrained from renewing them during the efforts of the league to compose the matter is in itself a remarkable and promising achievement. It is doubtful whether these countries would have submitted to any other tribunal than the league. It is certain that a conflict which might otherwise have rekindled another general war through the involvement of Russia has been kept in abeyance by the moral prestige of the league.

"Sixth. It has aided materially in settling an incipient quarrel between Poland and Austria over the disposition of Jewish fugitives and saved these unfortunate people from bitter experiences.

"Seventh. It secured the definition of the frontier of Armenia, but has been prevented from extending more substantial aid by the fact that the treaty of Sevres has not yet been enforced by the allied powers. The appeals to the league in the Albanian, Austria-Yugoslavia, Panama-Costa Rica, Greece-Bulgaria, Bolivia-Chile, France-Hejaz, and Persia-Soviet controversies show that the world is looking to the league as a source of international justice.

"Eighth. The confirmation of the transfer of the sovereignty of Eupen and Malmedy from Germany to Belgium was another function which it successfully performed.

"Ninth. The fact that an organization of 51 nations, comprising more than three-fourths of the earth's population, is pledged to the peaceful settlement of disputes, and may discuss the merits of controversies everywhere, has a composing effect on all the world and tends to localize whatever hostilities may from time to time break out. It has organized the public opinion of almost all mankind for peace, and has thus minimized the chances for the spread of a conflict from country to country and alliance to alliance which before the advent of the league was a perpetual threat to humanity.

"Tenth. Its technical financial organization has rendered an immense service through the Brussels conference, where the most comprehensive survey of world finances yet known was made and an international credit system devised with wonderful possibilities. An endeavor to apply this system to Austria, with the allied powers suspending their claims for a period of 20 years, has been balked by the refusal of the United States to take a similar step as to her claims. The Brussels conference warned all countries against any measures of drastic deflation.

"Eleventh. Its permanent commission on disarmament is making a profound study of that fundamental question. Mention should here be made of the fact that the absence of the United States from the league has been recognized as one of the greatest obstacles in the way of disarmament. The failure of the United States to ratify the treaty of St. Germain for the regulation of the traffic in arms, although she had previously signed it, is another barrier to the peaceful aims of mankind. It is probable that this matter will be brought to the attention of our Government at the coming conference on limitation of armament.

"Twelfth. The league worked out a system of mandate administration under the covenant more than a year ago, but both the league and the allied powers have been halted by the claim of the United States that she must be consulted as to mandates and must approve them before they become operative.

"The mandate system of the league is a new and refreshing thing in history. It provides that territories changing control as a result of the war must be administered as a sacred trust for civilization and in the interest of the inhabitants, the mandatory power making a report every year to a league of nations, and thus subjecting its record to the light of a world publicity, the bar of world opinion. In arresting the application of this system for so long a time, with the world in so restless and disturbed a condition, the United States has done more to imperil peace and delay the return of stability than may easily be measured.

"Thirteenth. Through its representative, Dr. Nansen, the league has aided in the return of hundreds of thousands of war prisoners to their homes.

"Fourteenth. Through its technical bodies and its commissions it is dealing more effectively with the arrest of epidemics, the suppression of the opium traffic, the white-slave trade, and other objects of international concern than has ever been possible before.

"Fifteenth. Its technical committee on transit and the great conference at Barcelona held under its direction on this important subject have made marked advances toward the elimination of useless and unnecessary burdens on international shipments. The object is to make possible an uninterrupted shipment on a continuous bill of lading from and to all parts of the world.

"Sixteenth. Carrying out the spirit of article 23 of the league covenant whereby the member nations agreed to establish an international organization to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor, both in their territories and in the countries with which they had commercial and industrial relations, part 13 of the Versailles treaty established the International Labor Organization. Membership in the league carries with it membership in this organization; but the latter has an existence entirely distinct from that of the league.

"The International Labor Organization was authorized to operate through a general conference and to establish an international labor office to collect and distribute information on all subjects relating to industrial life and labor and perform such other duties as might be assigned it by the conference, as well as certain functions assigned it by the treaty in connection with international disputes.

"The general conference meets annually and is composed of four representatives of each member nation. Two of the representatives are selected by the Government, one representing employers, the other employees. The work of the conference is to discuss desirable legislation affecting workers and to embody them in recommendations to member countries for legislative or treaty enactment, as may seem in each case advisable. Its recommendations are in no sense binding on the member nations.

"As heretofore indicated, two of these conferences have already been held—the first at Washington in 1919, the second at Geneva in 1920—and their recommendations have been described. It is worthy of note that 36 nations have either enacted legislation or have bills pending in their legislative bodies carrying out one or more of these recommendations. To be more specific, 13 have enacted such legislation and 23 have measures pending.

"The International Labor Office has been in operation for more than a year and its activities are of the greatest interest and assistance to the world-wide cause of labor. Investigations by a special commission of experts are being made into the causes of unemployment throughout the world, into conditions surrounding emigration with a view to international understandings for regulation of emigrant traffic and treatment of working-class emigrants. The office is studying from a standpoint of world-wide scope the subjects of cooperation, insurance against sickness, old age, and accident; maternity insurance; help for widows and orphans; industrial relations; agricultural labor; laws affecting labor in all the nations of the earth.

"Seventeenth. The recent reference by the supreme council of the allied powers to the league council of the Upper Silesian question with power to act, evidences the rapid advance of the league toward the position the covenant intended it to occupy in the maintenance of world stability.

"Eighteenth. The unanimity and the spirit of concession which have marked the league's proceedings for nearly two years are among the chief evidences of its capacity to function under the covenant."

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Association of the Bar of the City of New York at a recent meeting adopted a certain resolution with respect to the pending treaties. It is very brief, and in view of the importance of that association I ask unanimous consent that it lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Association of the Bar of the City of New York approves and adopts the report of its committee on international law, dated March 13, 1922, and the resolutions contained therein, and the secretary of this association is requested to transmit these resolutions to the Senators in Congress from the State of New York, and this association expresses its conviction that the peace of the world and the welfare of the people of the United States require the prompt ratification of the several treaties now pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to article 19 of the pending treaty, which has been read. Without objection, the article is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, several Senators have suggested to me that it would be more agreeable if we could arrange to vote to-morrow. So I offer the following proposition for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m., on the Calendar Day of Wednesday, March 29, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment or reservation that may be pending, any amendment or reservation that may be offered, and upon the resolution of ratification of Executive L, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, a treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to entering into the agreement as read? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Now that unanimous consent has been given, and in order to save time to-morrow, so that Senators may have all the time possible to speak, I suggest that the rest of the treaty be read article by article at this time, or else that unanimous consent may be given to dispense with the reading of it article by article. I make the request for unanimous consent that the further reading article by article may be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts requests unanimous consent that the further reading of the treaty by articles be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address with reference to disarmament by Hon. Charles H. Rutherford before the Arizona Bar Association at Nogales, Ariz., on February 11, 1922.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES H. RUTHERFORD BEFORE THE ARIZONA BAR ASSOCIATION AT NOGALES, ARIZ., FEBRUARY 11, 1922.

DISARMAMENT.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Arizona Bar Association, the anthropologists tell us it has taken some few hundreds of thousands of years for man to emerge from the jungle and to attain his present position, a position which we call "civilized," and which, at any rate, represents the height of his advancement.

Is man, of his own volition, going to undo this work of untold and uncountable centuries and plunge once more into the depths of barbarism, the status of his Cro-Magnon or Neanderthal ancestors, the status of the cave dwellers, the lake dwellers, the jungle dwellers?

He is, most assuredly, unless he adopts some measure of international policy that will bring about a complete cessation of that foolish, that suicidal, that barbarian thing called war; the thing that has brought upon the world of the twentieth century a condition closely approaching international bankruptcy and international anarchy.

I say international bankruptcy advisedly and with full knowledge of what the term involves. It is after all a simple term and one that is familiar to all of us. It simply means that, like the individual, a nation is in a bankrupt state when its liabilities exceed its assets, and that it is the condition of no small part of civilization to-day. There is no use in disguising the fact or in sticking our heads in the sand like the ostrich; the civilized world to-day which participated in the World War, with the sole exception of the United States, is unable to meet its obligations and is therefore in a bankrupt condition. I realize that it is impossible for any court to issue a decree in bankruptcy against a nation but this does not alter the fact.

It remains to inquire the reason, and the answer is simple. It is war—war past, war present, and war to come. Just as we may and frequently do—relieve the ordinary bankrupt by removing some of his disabilities and by giving him a chance to readjust his affairs, so we can relieve a bankrupt world by removing the fundamental, the sole and only cause of the trouble, and that is war.

Tables have been printed time and again within the past year showing that all of the revenues of civilized States, including our own, from 70 to 90 per cent are being spent to-day for war purposes, the interest and amortization charges on the debts incurred in waging past wars, the maintenance of armies and navies in anticipation of wars to come.

This condition was keenly realized when the World War was brought to a conclusion by the signing of the armistice, and one of the cardinal objects of the formation of the League of Nations was to secure a large measure of disarmament. That the attempt failed is not to be laid at the door of the promulgators of the league idea; they, at least, were sincere and in earnest in their attempts to solve the one great international problem. It was perhaps not to have been expected that this first effort would meet with complete success. The minds of men were too wrought up by the fearful disturbances of the preceeding four years to allow them an unclouded perspective, and it may be that there was error in the conception of a supreme international body that should undertake by force to eliminate warfare. I am not called to judge upon this point or even to venture an opinion. The great fact is that the league has failed to function as many hoped it would, even if we feared that it was a foredoomed failure.

I do not believe that force is the proper solution of this problem, which must be solved if our wonderful civilization is to endure. I believe that President Harding is more nearly upon the right track in calling a conference of the great powers to discuss the possibilities of a sweeping reduction of armaments as the one practical means of preventing such another cataclysm as a suffering world has just endured. I take it as axiomatic that when nations have great armies, huge navies, submarines, fleets of fighting aircraft, and all other appliances and appurtenances of war, they are going to use them; that so long as we train hundreds of thousands of men to fight, on the land, in the water, under the water, and in the air, just so long we are going to have war. Had any man prophesied in the early months of 1914 that another year would see the world, the whole civilized world, struggling on the battle fields of France, of Russia, of Belgium, of Italy, and of Asia Minor we would have called him a lunatic. And yet the magazine was loaded, the train laid, and it required but the mad act of a crazy anarchist, the Serbian, at Sarajevo, in Bosnia, to touch the match to the powder and to cause the explosion of June 28, 1914, that set the civilized world at war a few weeks later.

Nobody with reasoning powers will be foolish enough to allege that it was the assassination of Prince Ferdinand and his wife—morganatic, by the way—that caused the Great War. This was but the excuse for which Germany had been waiting, the opportunity for which she had sought for years.

Nor did the Kaiser lose time in taking advantage of the situation. I shall not attempt to review the major happenings of the war, but will call your attention to just one point, and that is the most solemn treaties, the most weighty international pacts, were but as a mote in the sunbeam when they interfered in any way with the purposes of the belligerents. The territory of Belgium was invaded without a scruple, the treaties being contemptuously called "scraps of paper" and most assuredly treated as such. The solemn covenants concerning the conduct of war, and especially concerning the treatment of noncombatants, Red Cross organizations, civic corporations, and hospitals were completely disregarded and the butcherly Huns threw aside every mask and cloak of civilization, every treaty obligation, every Hague convention, every rule of what was called "civilized" warfare, if, indeed, there is such a thing.

Here we have evidence not to be disregarded that the most solemn treaties, the most binding engagements, are indeed but scraps of paper when they stand in the way of national ambition or national lust for dominion.

The crowning atrocity came on April 22, 1915, when the Germans loosed in front of Ypres the first cloud of poisonous gas against the unprotected enemy and introduced into warfare a new element that made it more brutal and more bestial than ever before.

If we read the history of all warfare with attention we shall find, I think, that such was the inevitable outcome—the ultimate expression of brutality. Our ancestors of the jungle days fought with clubs and stones, leading the way to the deadlier spear and sword, the bow, and finally to gunpowder and all the train of modern high explosives, culminating as regards the latter, in 1878 when Alfred Nobel, the founder of peace prizes, made his fame and his fortune by dissolving guncotton in nitroglycerine and thus fathering the whole tribe of nitrogen derivatives, which represent the acme of deadly effectiveness. The introduction of chlorine, phosgene, mustard gas, the sternutators, the lachrymators, and all the rest of the wretched family was but another step in the horrid evolution of means of destruction.

They shocked the world, they brought undying opprobrium on the name of Germany, but they were used none the less, and the only possible defense was retaliation in kind.

If the world retains its armaments, its fighting tools, we shall see another war just as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow morning, and the imagination fails when one attempts to picture its horrors.

It seems to me that there is but one remedy—disarmament—and this may prove a partial failure. It is, none the less, the only thinkable remedy, and most assuredly the only one upon which we may count with any confidence for results. We will admit at the very outset that certain police forces are necessary, both on land and sea, but national armament should stop just there. I believe if the five or six great world powers agree to the measures of limitation proposed by the President, to whom the credit of the great idea is solely due, we will have erected the one possible barrier against future war. If the nations fail to come to such agreement, we can but prepare for another outbreak, and possibly before we and the world are many years older.

I said a moment ago that even disarmament might not avail to save our civilization, and in making that statement I am well within the facts. I have had opportunity within the week to examine the advance sheets of a work not yet published in this country, "The Riddle of the Rhine," written by Maj. Victor Lefebure, of the British Army—and I am free to confess that the author has shaken my faith, even in disarmament. He was one of the leaders in the British chemical warfare divisions, and he points out the deadly fact that any organic chemical industry can be turned overnight into an arsenal for the production of every deadly gas. We know that when the United States was drawn into the World War we realized the importance of this subject speedily, and we know also that just before the armistice was signed Professor Lewis, of Northwestern University, was manufacturing at the rate of 10 tons per day at the "Mousetrap," near Cleveland, a gas so deadly that it broke new ground entirely. Its composition has not been disclosed—pray God it will never be—but we have the positive assurance of men who know that it exceeded in deadliness anything that even the fertile deviltry of the Germans had been able to invent up to that time.

The trouble of this whole wretched business is that the very same elementary substances that our chemists combine to form dyes, medicines, synthetic perfumes, yes, even synthetic foods, are the fountain stones of the manufacture of lethal gases, and the plant which to-day is turning out indigo or cocaine or attar of roses can to-morrow be making poison gas, with hardly a change in equipment.

Synthetic chemistry is the greatest blessing the world has known for many a century, but it is a Janus-like creature. It has blessings in one hand, curses in the other; with one face it looks to making our lives pleasant and more comfortable because less laborious, with the other it looks to the very dissolution of our civilization; I might say to its complete obliteration, for it is certain that another great war would be strictly a chemical war, in which the casualties would be counted by computing the number of men engaged.

I confess this is painting a gloomy picture, but anyone who will do a few hours' reading can verify the facts for himself. As representatives of one of the learned professions, I ask you to look into this phase of the subject, which, I confess, was new to me until a very short time ago.

Be all these things as they may, we must agree that some measure of limiting armaments offers the only possible escape from a terrible condition, and we must join, irrespective of our political affiliations, in giving credit where credit is due—in this case to our honored President, Warren G. Harding, whose powerful mind sketched out the first completely practicable method of avoiding the thing that has cursed humanity from its earliest history and which, unless checked, can not be prevented from destroying what humanity has toiled for æons to build up.

Should not we, the exponents of a profession of peace, one which depends for its very existence on stability and on civilization, put behind our President and his advisers every ounce of energy and of effort that we can bring to bear on the issue?

TARIFF ON VEGETABLE OILS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading two telegrams on the subject of a tariff on vegetable oils.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DALLAS, TEX., March 27, 1922.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Please deliver the following telegram to Senators MCCUMBER, WATSON of Indiana, CURTIS of Kansas, and SIMMONS of North Carolina, members of the Finance Committee, also to Senator GOODING, chairman of western tariff bloc, immediately:

"The emergency vegetable oil tariff has saved cotton-oil industry from disaster and has given the southern farmers $8 per ton additional for cotton seed for past crop, aggregating $25,000,000. Texas and Oklahoma Cottonseed Crushers' Association both on record and 80 per cent of the independent crude cotton oil mills. These two States are now for a tariff on vegetable oils, with duties as high as provided in present emergency bill. Many mills who were at New Orleans meeting, the results of which are the present brief submitted to the Finance Committee by the Interstate Cottonseed Crushers' Association, have changed their minds and feel they were misled by the importers, exporters, and what are known as the larger interests in the business.

"The organized farmers have demanded tariff on vegetable oils. Their interests are primary and they deserve protection against cheap oriental vegetable fats, and if they are placed on the free list the price of all fats produced in this country will be materially lowered. There has been a paid propaganda against the tariff, amply financed, but none for it because of the disorganized and impoverished condition of the independent crude cottonseed oil mills. Hope Finance Committee will grant proper duties to protect the American farmer and the independent crude cotton oil industry."

W. A. BENNETT,
President Texas Cottonseed Crushers' Association and owner of mills at Seymour and Jacksboro, Tex.
ED WOODALL,
President mills at Hillsboro, Grandview, Hubbard, Mount Calm, and Frost, Tex.
J. S. LECLERQ,
General Manager Dallas Oil & Refining Co., Dallas, Tex.
L. R. MUNGER,
General Manager mills at Mexia, Teague, and Wortham, Tex,
E. R. CALLIER,
President Trinity Cotton Oil Co., Dallas, Tex.
J. W. SIMMONS,
General Manager mills at Sweetwater, Quanah, and Hamlin.
J. A. UNDERWOOD,
Mills at Honey Grove and Wolfe City, Tex.
B. W. COUCH,
President mills at Fort Worth and Taylor, Tex.
C. C. LITTLETON,
General Manager mills at Fort Worth, Gainesville, Whitesboro, Weatherford, and Nocona, Tex.
W. F. PENDLETON,
General Manager mills at Farmersville, Celina, and Munday, Tex.

DALLAS, TEX., March 27, 1922.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Am advised that renewed efforts are being made to put vegetable oils on free list. Texas farm bureau, our cotton association, and other agricultural interests believe that it would be rank discrimination to force our farmers to compete with oriental producers of vegetable oils when manufacturing interests are protected by tariff. Our once promising peanut industry has been practically destroyed by such competition. Please present our views to Senate committee and others in position to help.

JOHN T. ORR,
President Texas Farm Bureau Federation.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH, late a Representative from the State of Texas, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions of the House of Representatives were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 28, 1922.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH, a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the Senate the death of Representative LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH, of Texas. He was a man of splendid achievements, of high promise, representing the best type of American citizenship. At some later date I shall call the attention of the Senate at greater length to his life and career.

I offer the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 261) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now take a recess till 12 o'clock meridian to-morrow.

In accordance with the third resolution the Senate, in open executive session (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 29, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed Heavenly Father, the earth wind has blown and death has made its encroachment upon us and we are touched with sorrow. In the strength of noble manhood, in the light and promise of the Christian's faith, he has left us. Be with those who have such heaviness of soul and darkness of outlook and give them great peace. May we be impressed that the flowers of life wither even while they unfold; that the year is dying that we have just called "new." O teach us how few our days and how urgent is life. Lay Thy hand of wisdom upon our country and direct all who make and interpret our laws, and may the precepts and examples of Him who spoke with divine authority prevail among our people. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with business under the Calendar Wednesday rule to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE PARRISH.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House that death has again claimed one of our Members, this time a man in the full vigor of life, a man whose going from us leaves a sense of personal loss to every Member of this body. Last night a message came from Texas to members of the Texas delegation that LUCIAN W. PARRISH, a Member of this body, had lost in the brave fight which he was making against death. We understand the funeral will be to-morrow afternoon at his home.

At a later time I shall ask that a day be set apart for proper proceedings and resolutions in the House. At this time I send to the desk to be read the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 311.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. LUCIAN WALTON PARRISH, a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the resolution heretofore adopted, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 29, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 11083) to repeal and reenact chapter 100, 1914 (Public, No. 108), to provide for the restoration of Fort McHenry, in the State of Maryland, and its permanent preservation as a national park and perpetual national memorial shrine as the birthplace of the immortal Star Spangled Banner, written by Francis Scott Key, for the appropriation of the necessary funds, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKESON: A bill (H. R. 11084) granting a pension to Catherine J. Mock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUCE: A bill (H. R. 11085) granting a pension to Carrie E. Jackson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBSION: A bill (H. R. 11086) granting an increase of pension to Rosa Green; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 11087) granting an increase of pension to John F. Scott; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

4864. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the Women's Council of the Seneca Club, of Brooklyn, N. Y., urging retention of the Brooklyn Navy Yard; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

4865. By Mr. APPLEBY: Petition of citizens of Monmouth County, N. J., urging the passage of the Ackerman daylight savings bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

4866. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the National Association of United States Civil Service Employees at Navy Yards and Stations, at Brooklyn, N. Y., relative to retention of certain supply stations; to the Committees on Military Affairs and Naval Affairs.

4867. By Mr. FULLER: Petition of citizens of Ottawa, Ill., protesting against the Hill bill (H. R. 9691); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4868. Also, petition of the board of supervisors of La Salle County, Ill., urging passage of the Hill bill (H. R. 9691); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4869. Also, resolutions of the city council of the city of Peru, Ill., favoring legislation to permit the manufacture and sale of pure beers and light wines; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4870. Also, resolutions of the Streator (Ill.) Ministerial Association, protesting against the propaganda to modify existing law so as to permit the manufacture and sale of beer and wine; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

4871. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of the Seneca Club, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

4872. Also, petition of the Twenty-seventh Signal Company, New York National Guard, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1922.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 16, 1922.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

NAVAL ARMAMENT TREATY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the pending treaty.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to chapter 2 of the treaty.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Moses	Sutherland
Borah	Glass	Nelson	Swanson
Broussard	Gooding	New	Townsend
Bursum	Hale	Oddie	Trammell
Cameron	Harris	Overman	Underwood
Capper	Harrison	Page	Wadsworth
Caraway	Hitchcock	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Colt	Johnson	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Warren
Cummins	King	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Dial	La Follette	Rawson	Weller
Edge	Lenroot	Sheppard	Williams
Ernst	Lodge	Simmons	Willis
Fernald	McNary	Spencer

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are absent on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, apropos of some discussion on yesterday touching the treaty now before us, I desire to call attention to a dispatch from Paris appearing in the Washington Post this morning in a rather inconspicuous part of the paper, as follows:

The council of the league to-day increased the membership of the mixed committee on disarmament, adding Lord Robert Cecil, of England; Gustave Ador, former president of Switzerland; former Premier Nitti, of Italy; M. Lebrun, former French minister of marine; Señor Gonzales Hontoria, former Spanish minister of foreign affairs; Señor Urrutia, Colombian minister to Switzerland; and Prince Sapieha, former Polish minister.

The council also urged the committee to resume as soon as possible the active work of preparing a basis for the general disarmament plan which the council will submit to the assembly of the league next September.

I am happy to announce accordingly that the work of the league in its effort to procure pacification and disarmament of Europe seems to be progressing with the cooperation of the first statesmen of Europe.

Mr. President, in Swift's lines on his own death he reviews what his associates will say concerning his probable dissolution as the evidences of age and decrepitude begin to manifest themselves. This one will predict that the Dean will not last a year; another one says that he will die within six months; another dear friend makes a prediction that he will not last 30 days; but he does last 30 days, to the great discomfiture of the friend who made the prognostication; and the Dean says:

I had rather die
Than his predictions prove a lie.

I sometimes think that the esteemed gentlemen upon the other side feel some kind of twinges of regret every time the League of Nations accomplishes anything, like the adjustment of the Silesian boundary controversy and the settlement of the controversy over the Aland Islands. I trust, however, that they will be glad to approve anything that is accomplished now by this rather imposing committee on disarmament.

I want to submit also, Mr. President, another article appearing in the same issue of this newspaper, affording us some hope that, notwithstanding it was found impossible by the disarmament conference in Washington to accomplish anything whatever toward disarmament, so far as land forces are concerned, the situation appears not to be altogether hopeless:

PARIS, March 28 (by the Associated Press).—When debate was resumed in the Senate to-day on the question of budget expenses recoverable from Germany, Senator Fourment presented the socialist view of the general financial problem in connection with reparations, asking whether it was really necessary to keep 800,000 men under the colors. Was there not, he asked, a danger of giving France the semblance of militarism in the eyes of the world?

Senator Fourment advocated suppression of bearer bonds as a preventive of fiscal evasion, and the creation of an international fund, with an international loan, for the payment of pensions.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am gratified that the pending treaty is here, and that we shall have an opportunity to vote for it. I, therefore, do not rise to criticize the treaty, but simply to suggest that it ought to be considered, not only in the Senate Chamber but elsewhere, as the beginning, and only the beginning, of the work of disarmament. I have no doubt but this treaty represents all that it was possible to secure from the disarmament conference: I have no doubt that our delegates did everything possible in the way of securing disarmament that it was practicable to do. Nevertheless, I should regard this treaty as a disaster rather than a benefit if the treaty should be regarded either here in the Senate Chamber or elsewhere as comprising all that there is to do in the matter of disarmament even during the next 10 years, the life of the treaty.

It is perfectly proper for us to congratulate ourselves and the country upon what has been achieved, but it is exceedingly important that we utilize the occasion also for considering what there is yet to do. Really, Mr. President, while it is a beginning, which, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said yesterday, ought to mark, and, perhaps, will mark, an era in the progress of civilization, nevertheless it accomplishes very little compared with what we must ultimately accomplish in order to get the benefit of this first step in the cause of disarmament. In other words, if we regard it as the beginning, we can not praise it too much; but if we regard it in any sense as a completed program, and the country is to understand that disarmament has been accomplished, I would consider it as a misfortune.

There has been much dispute about who was the author of the disarmament conference. The real author of the disarmament conference was public opinion. It never would have been called without the power and stress of public opinion, and able as were the delegates who represented us they could not have accomplished or achieved anything at all worth while without the power of public opinion; and so without the continued, sustained, and well-directed power of public opinion, the treaty which is before us will, in the end, amount to but very little in the way of ridding the world of the armaments under which it is now bending.

It is not, therefore, Mr. President, that I wish to be understood as appreciating any less than do others the worth of the pending treaty, but it is that I would be understood as saying that it is but the beginning, and unless we go forward, molding and directing public opinion to achieve real disarmament, we shall not reap very much benefit from what has already been achieved.

Consider the Navy, Mr. President, as it is left under the agreements in the pending treaty, and yet I understand, as I said a moment ago, at the first step the members of the conference accomplished all that was possible. But suppose that we were to be content with that; suppose we should sterilize the interest and the enthusiasm which has been aroused in favor of disarmament and should rest with the achievements thus far accomplished, what would be the condition of the world with reference to naval armaments alone? No such naval armaments have ever been known in the history of the world as will exist when this treaty shall have been ratified. I have before me the statement which was placed in the RECORD a few days ago by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with reference to the capital-ship strength of the various nations, which in itself is stupendous; but in addition to that the conference was wholly unable to deal with the question of submarines or to deal with any other implements of modern sea warfare other than airplane carriers. The great instruments of modern sea warfare are left untouched, uncontrolled, and unlimited. To-day, Mr. President, so far as the Orient is concerned, Japan has all the navy that she needs to dominate and control the entire situation. When we take up and review the budgets of the respective nations which were here assembled and compare those budgets as they will go into effect after the ratification of the treaty with the budgets which were carried last year the difference will be found to be almost insignificant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reenforcement of what the Senator from Idaho is saying I should like him to permit me to read an extract from the April number of the World's Work, showing a curious popular apprehension of the practical effect of the naval disarmament treaty. The article, among other things, says:

A curious misconception of the most dramatic achievement of the Washington conference seems to have become widespread in the United States. That achievement was truly epochal in human history; it wrote "Finis" to the ruinous and war-breeding race of the nations for greater relative naval strength. That race had led America, Great Britain, and Japan into projects for navies of much greater size and power than any now in existence. These projects were abandoned at Washington, and each country agreed to a permanent relative power and to a fixed maximum.

And this is especially what I wish to call attention to—

But this fixed maximum (and here enters the popular misconception) is not less than the navies these countries now possess, but is considerably larger in every case. Thus the "Hughes-plan" American Navy is a more powerful Navy than the one we now possess.

By the "Hughes plan" we lose 4,000 tons in capital ships, but we gain 135,000 tons in aircraft carriers. And as no limits were set upon submarines, destroyers, and auxiliary craft, the "Hughes-plan Navy" remains in these respects the Navy of our previous program, which called for considerable building in these craft. The "Hughes-plan Navy" will probably cost about $50,000,000 a year more than our present Navy; but it will cost $120,000,000 a year less than the Navy we should otherwise soon have had, with every prospect that that Navy would grow continually larger and more costly. We have achieved a great moral gain and avoided a great financial burden, but we should remember exactly what the gain was and exactly how the burden was lifted.

I happened to be reading that a few minutes before the Senator took the floor, and it comes so absolutely apropos in reinforcement of what he is saying that I wanted it inserted in his speech.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the quotation which has been read by the Senator from Mississippi ought to be utilized, not, of course, for diminishing the credit due the achievement which has resulted, but to indicate what is yet ahead of us if we are going to have real disarmament.

The weapons of modern warfare on the sea are all as yet practically without any limitation or control. I read this morning a statement that—

> Japan is building large submarines of such great cruising radius that they will be able to cross the Pacific and operate on our western coast for a month and then return to Japan without refueling.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from what that quotation is taken?

Mr. BORAH. It is from the April number of the Atlantic Monthly in an article by Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. We are simply beginning the great struggle for disarmament, which can only be carried to a successful conclusion by the same power which has brought us thus far on the way, and that is the power of public opinion. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator heretofore in some of his admirable addresses has referred to Archibald Hurd, one of the great naval experts of Europe. In a recent article written by him and appearing in the Fortnightly Review of January of this year he states that one of the results of the Washington conference will be to—> set up a higher standard for submarines, placing upon each nation what amounts practically to an obligation to continue building submarines—

And so forth.

In effect, he declares that the work of the Washington conference will not diminish the cost of naval armaments in the future.

Mr. BORAH. It will if we go ahead with the work and do not regard the result of the Washington conference as the conclusion of the work.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator has stressed the necessity of continued activity in the direction of the reduction of naval armaments. In that suggestion I entirely concur; but, in view of the reference to the activities of the League of Nations, I am wondering if the Senator in his thought as to future activities along this line believes that the agency of the League of Nations would be the most conducive to real, practical results or that some other instrumentality had better be employed.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is worth while or necessary for me to digress and discuss that proposition. I will say, however, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] this morning, that it might be applied particularly to those who are known as "irreconcilables," that there are no twinges of regret over here upon our part, so far as I know, at any success which the League of Nations may have or may enjoy in settling the controversies and difficulties in Europe, or any success which it may have in relieving Europe of the burdens of armament. I have my own opinion as to what it has accomplished. It is not necessary at this time to debate it. It might differ entirely from the view entertained by those who are more earnest in support of the league; but if it should transpire that the league can adjust the controversies of Europe, can assist in relieving Europe of its armament, and can mollify the situation, no one will be more happy to record that fact than the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer a further interruption there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad to hear this avowal from the Senator from Idaho, in view of the attitude he has always taken with respect to the League of Nations. I think, without regard to party affiliations, every one of us who attended the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union at Stockholm last summer was profoundly impressed with the seriousness with which the European statesmen there assembled took the work of the League of Nations and how they regarded it as a live and active and most beneficial agency for the adjustment and settlement of the many perplexing problems that confront the nations of Europe. Regret was generally expressed that the United States was not a member of the league; but a determination was manifested, notwithstanding that, to use and develop this agency for the purpose of settling their own troubles and controversies.

I submit, Mr. President, whether the Senate of the United States and the executive authorities of the United States might not very wisely take into consideration whether the United States might not be helpful by sending representatives to act, as they were invited to do, in a consultative capacity, merely observers, as we do in connection with other agencies established by the treaty of Versailles, to lend at least our moral support to what they are doing, instead of standing back and jeering at what they are trying to do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what, in a practical way, the League of Nations has accomplished, in view of the present disturbances in Europe and the Near East?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer the Senator——

Mr. POINDEXTER. One second, in order to call the Senator's attention to the particular matter I have in mind. The league already includes practically all the European nations; and if it has any effect, as its advocates claim, it would seem that it could accomplish some substantial service for mankind in Europe, in that section of the world composed of its constituent members. I read the other day——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will stop in just one second. I read the other day a very circumstantial account of a parade of the so-called red army in Moscow, and a declaration of Mr. Trotski that they proposed to dictate their policies, so far as Russia was concerned, at the point of the bayonet, so to speak. The world is disturbed about the controversy between the nationalist Turks and the Greeks, and there are many other such warlike operations going on within the area of the League of Nations. I have heard of nothing substantial that they have done even to mollify that situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I respectfully refer the Senator from Washington to the able review by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] here a few weeks ago of what has been accomplished.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to get into a discussion of the league question because that is not what I rose to discuss this morning. I only wanted to say in answer to the Senator from Montana that the league can not achieve anything which will make me at all regretful of the position which I have taken. If it accomplishes anything substantial, I will rejoice with the Senator from Montana in that fact. I have always felt that until Europe should adopt some kind of a federalizing principle with reference to Europe there is no hope for Europe, and it is possible that the league itself may have the effect of bringing about in Europe something in the nature of a federalized Europe. I believe, as has been said by Mr. Wells, who is a great advocate of the league—and I do not always agree with him—that until Europe does federalize itself to some extent, no one who is a friend of America can expect America to go into such a chaos as obtains there.

That, however, is aside from what I rose to say.

I have referred briefly to the condition in which the naval treaty leaves the world with reference to naval armament. Perhaps there will be a saving of something like fifty to one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars, as it has been estimated, in the way of actual expenditure, by reason of this treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator means, for America alone?

Mr. BORAH. I mean for America alone; and that is about all that will be saved, too, altogether, because it is now apparent that the other nations are transferring the expenditure from the battleship side to the submarines and other instruments of naval warfare. When, however, we compare one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars with the budgets which are actually being prepared, and the amount of money which we will have actually to raise, we can see how much work there is ahead before the taxpayer will get any real relief from this great movement of disarmament.

But naval disarmament is not alone the one which must have consideration at the hands of those who believe in disarmament. I was opposed from the beginning, as you all know, to including land disarmament in this call. I felt that the situation in Europe would not admit of any progress, that nothing could be accomplished in regard to it; and it seems to me, in view of subsequent events, that that belief was well founded. That, however, is no reason why the movement should not continue and the cause go forward until the situation may be such that the question of land disarmament can become a subject to be dealt with in a practical way.

At the present time, Mr. President, there is no limitation at all upon armament with reference to land. It was suggested here the other day in the Senate that France had reduced her army. It may be true; I do not know; it is very difficult to get the exact facts in regard to that; but the latest information I have been able to secure is that she has not, and, according to Poincare's statement lately made, they do not propose to do so. Japan certainly has not reduced her army. I have here an item from the press a few days ago which advises us as to her attitude in regard to that matter. This is dated March 18, and is a press dispatch:

Japanese reactionaries have apparently won their fight against an almost universal demand for army reduction.

The militarists are standing pat, announcing they prefer cabinet crises to reduction of armaments.

Besides insisting upon a large army, reactionary leaders have proposed a bill to restrict liberal thought. Recent developments in Japan, believed to presage a more liberal era, have only served to bring out the full force of reaction and militarism.

The Japanese War Minister, Yamanishi, is at outs with the premier over the army. He has announced he will agree to a reduction of not more than 50,000 men and that the money saved must be applied to the purchase of more machine guns.

And so forth. That is true in France; that is true in Japan. There is not very much desire in the United States, either, to reduce the Army. We now have an Army of 150,000 men. That is the same sized Army that we had before the four-power treaty was ratified and before the naval armament conference met, and they contend that nothing has happened which justifies the reduction of the Army in the slightest; so we are not getting any benefit from the standpoint of reduction of the Army by reason of anything which took place at the conference. In addition to the 150,000 Regular Army, we have now, as I am advised, a National Guard approaching 150,000 men; so we have at the present time a force of something like 300,000 men. We are advised, nevertheless, by General Pershing and by the Secretary of War that it would be very dangerous to reduce the Regular Army below the 150,000 mark.

One statement which was made by the Secretary of War last night is really surprising to me. I should like to know more about it. Perhaps the paper does not give the full statement.

"I consider Hawaii and the Panama Canal Zone," said Mr. Weeks today, "to be the two most important points at which this Government should maintain troops. It is absolutely essential that the Canal Zone be fully protected at all times against any possible contingency or attack."

Secretary Weeks stated that a most careful study was being made of all possible methods of defending the Panama Canal against attack from any quarter.

Of course, I understand perfectly that the Panama Canal should be policed; that there should be sufficient guards and sufficient protection to prevent evildoers or those who might be disposed to destroy it from accomplishing their end; but here is a statement which seems to indicate that the authorities in charge of the War Department contemplate some kind of an attack, that there is still a danger there. Mr. President, if we have entered into the four-power treaty and if we are proceeding now upon the theory of disarmament and upon the theory that these things mean peace, there ought to be some manifestation of that in our program with reference to the strength of the Army. I do not believe that there is any danger of attack on the Panama Canal in the sense that some nation is going to attack it, some country is going to assail it. If I thought so, I would regard the four-power treaty as a trap, as a camouflage to protect the enemy, as calculated to mislead the people and to lull them to sleep while the enemy is lurking about for the purpose of availing itself of the advantage of our sleep.

I hope that when the Army bill reaches the Senate these people will have experienced a change of feeling, and that it will manifest itself in our appropriation bills. I think we could very well afford to reduce the Army to a hundred thousand men, in view of the fact that we have a National Guard of 150,000 men, and if we do so I will be glad to credit it to the conference.

I observe that France takes a position with reference to her army almost identical with the view which is held by the representatives of our Army. I deplore these things, because I know if we proceed along that line that inside of five years—yes; inside of two years—the last vestige of benefit in the way of economy will have been wiped out; that no benefit whatever will be realized by the taxpayers from these treaties. If we are going to fill the public mind with the idea that there is still danger of attack from some foreign power, what benefit shall we derive from the conference? Where is the nation which is going to attack us? Is it Germany? Is it Austria? Is it Spain? Is it Italy? Is it France? There are only two nations in the world which, by any possible stretch of the imagination, could assail and attack us at the Panama Canal Zone or anywhere else. I need not mention those nations. But if the danger does lie with reference to those nations—and it can lie nowhere else—then we are making a fatal mistake in ratifying this treaty, and we made a fatal mistake in having ratified the four-power treaty. If we are not to have the faith which the treaties express, according to their proponents, if we are not to rely upon them, then they are a delusion and a snare. The way to manifest our reliance and to manifest our faith is to lead on in the cause of disarmament, which I trust we may do. We take risks in war; let us take some risk in the great cause of disarmament.

Mr. President, it has been about four years now since the war closed, but we are not by any means free of the war spirit, of the idea that we must rely in these matters entirely upon force, that there is no other security. I think there will have to be a regeneration in our mental attitude, as well as a reconsideration of our budgets in regard to these things. I hope that those who have been advocating these treaties will put it in the form of a concrete fact, to wit, in our appropriation bill, and place a little less reliance upon force as the only remedy or the only method for the settlement of international affairs.

Mr. President, I would not take from the conference the honor or the glory which justly belongs to it, even if I could. I would not detract from the prestige of its delegation, or any one of them, even if I could. But I am interested in what has already been achieved only as a part of a great cause—a cause just begun and which must be carried forward to final success or civilization must perish. The cause of disarmament will fail, utterly fail, the moment the people lose interest in it or the moment they cease to be active and persistent in the cause. This is the people's fight, and to lull them into inactivity by giving out the word that disarmament has been achieved or that sufficient has been achieved to warrant inactivity would be to betray the whole cause and to imperil civilization. I have said what I have said, therefore, to-day as an indication of what I trust shall be my course in the future and something as a suggestion to those who are concerned in the cause to continue in the good work.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there is one part of this treaty to which I desire to advert, because it has been of extraordinary interest to me and to many who reside in the territory from which I come; that is article 19. With the rest of the treaty, that which relates to naval disarmament and which constituted the subject of the very brilliant opening of the arms conference, in common with everybody else, I was in full accord and to it gave enthusiastic indorsement. I am very glad indeed to register that approval and that indorsement.

When first I read article 19, however, I had some very serious misgivings. It will be observed that the article provides for the maintenance of the status quo in the Pacific with regard to fortifications and naval bases. Under it, without going into vast detail, we no longer will endeavor to fortify or make defensible the Philippine Islands nor will we attempt to establish a naval base at Guam.

It seemed to me at first, Mr. President, that this was an abandonment of the Philippines and a retreat in the Pacific. I could not quite reconcile that abandonment of the Pacific with the maintenance of a great naval base at Singapore by the British and with the maintenance of those bases which Japan in reality maintains and can maintain under this provision.

When the Foreign Relations Committee had this treaty under consideration I asked that some of the experts be called and that some information be afforded us. I was alone in that request; it did not have even a second, and the treaty was reported without any hearing or any evidence whatsoever. I then set about endeavoring to ascertain what I could in respect to it. I am not a naval strategist nor am I versed in military tactics at all. I talked with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; I talked at length with many others who presumably are expert concerning naval affairs. I interviewed others whose knowledge of fortifications is well known, and every one of them has assured me that this article 19 is not unjust to the United States and that the view I entertained respecting it was erroneous.

I am not entirely satisfied even now, Mr. President, although I concede my ignorance of the technical aspect of the question, and I would not for an instant put any view of mine in contradistinction to the views of the experts and our military and naval strategists. But, even though I am uncertain, I feel that I can not do otherwise than accept the views which have thus been put so emphatically to me. Whatever misgivings I have concerning article 19, though to my untutored mind it may seem to constitute an abandonment of the Philippines and a retreat in the Pacific, I feel I can do nothing else but accept the unanimous view which has been asserted to me, and the statements officially presented and those made by officials unofficially to me. I shall therefore yield my personal views of article 19 and vote for the ratification of the treaty as reported.

Mr. FRANCE obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from Maryland to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I realize that we are in executive session, and that the time belongs to the consideration of the treaty, but there is a conference report which I desire to call up. It is a partial report, and will require only adoption and the appointment of conferees for further consideration to dispose of it. The House is waiting and can not act until we act. So I ask unanimous consent for that reason to call up the conference report on House bill 10329, the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and as in legislative session the Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the report may be agreed to.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. I presume from the report submitted that there are a number of items upon which an agreement has been reached. Does the Senator ask us now to ratify the action of the conferees in agreeing upon those items?

Mr. WARREN. Certain matters have been agreed to and certain others have to go back for further consideration.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, if we are asked to ratify the action of the conferees as to those items upon which they have agreed, and which now the Senator desires we shall approve, we ought to be advised about them.

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, there are only three or four real differences, and they have been reconciled, but on account of the troublesome, and I might say almost obnoxious, rule of the House in one respect, a number of items, some 15 or 20, have to go back, because the conferees on the part of the House fear that they may contain legislation. We have agreed upon them, and the conferees on the part of the House will ask the indorsement of the House of those items.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I notice that a reduction has been made in the appropriation for the continuance of the work of construction of the transmountain road in the Glacier National Park from $100,000 to something like $65,000. I called the attention of the department to that feature, and I have not yet had an opportunity to confer with them about it. Inasmuch as this is not a final report, why should it not stand over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. WARREN. It would simply delay the further consideration of the appropriation bills and result in a congestion which I would like to avoid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I hope the Senator will find no serious objection to the request I make that the matter stand over until to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will state directly what he has in mind, I can perhaps give him some information upon it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have in mind the appropriation to which I referred, the usual appropriation of $100,000 for the continuance of the work of construction of the transmountain highway through the Glacier National Park. The usual appropriation is $100,000. That was heretofore carried in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; it was.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apparently the House has cut it to $65,000.

Mr. WARREN. The House did cut all of those matters, and the Senate put them up to the Budget estimate. In settling it they have asked us to take a certain percentage off all those items, which we have agreed to, and that, with others, is not in further conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My recollection is that about one-third was taken off this item. I would like to have an opportunity to confer with the department further in regard to it.

Mr. WARREN. I have no desire to cut the Senator off. I think in the end he would have to take it up with the conferees as conferees rather than with the department.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should not care to insist upon the delay if this were a final disposition of it, but the bill remains here, anyway.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will acquaint himself with the fact he desires to ascertain very soon, I shall not press it further now. This matter has been delayed for two months almost, for various reasons, and I am anxious to get it over to the House.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit me to propound an inquiry as to amendment No. 81?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Am I correct in understanding that the conferees have agreed to restore the matter stricken out by the Senate and to reinsert the following paragraph:

For continued investigation of the feasibility of water storage on the lower Colorado River for irrigation and other purposes and related problems, $100,000.

Mr. WARREN. That matter was settled by a slight change in language, and the appropriation of $100,000 was left in.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. There was an item carried in the bill as it came from the House making an appropriation for the Yellowstone National Park, which was stricken out by the Senate, I believe.

Mr. WARREN. We have stricken out nothing that was provided for that park. In fact, there was nothing added by the Senate, and hence nothing stricken out or added in conference. The House put in the amount estimated. The Senator is speaking of the Yellowstone?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes. I was referring to that. What about the Grand Canyon National Park?

Mr. WARREN. The Grand Canyon item is still in disagreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will lie over for the present.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10329) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, still in disagreement between the two Houses, and request a further conference with the House, and that the Vice President appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. As I understand, the report of the committee of conference has been agreed to. My request is simply that the Senate insist on its amendments and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. At what time was the conference report agreed to?

Mr. WARREN. It was agreed to this morning.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thought the conference report was to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. No; it was simply laid aside in order that the Senator from Montana might have an opportunity to consider an item which was contained in the bill. He has done so, and is now satisfied to have the action taken that I have suggested.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there are some other Senators who are interested in matters which are contained in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to take up time which belongs to the consideration of the pending treaty, but I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that, while of course it is nothing to me personally, the conference reports on appropriation bills must be considered if the Senate is to transact its business. They have to be passed on here in the Senate in order that they may be sent over to the House of Representatives.

Mr. PITTMAN. I realize that the Senator from Wyoming is very industrious in these matters—in fact, he possibly may be too industrious—but I notice a number of these bills have been reported to the Senate on one day and on the next day have been passed. There were several Senators this morning who desired to investigate items which are contained in this very important bill. I made inquiry with regard to a certain item in the bill and the Senator from Wyoming stated that it was still in conference, but I want to look into it further. I certainly understood, however, at that time that the report was to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. Until some other Senator may want it to go over for another day?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there are a great many things in this bill, in my opinion, which should be considered.

Mr. WARREN. I should be very glad if the report might be considered. It has been before us for some days, having been presented by me, as I recall, four days ago. Of course, if the Senator objects, it will have to go over.

Mr. PITTMAN. I give notice, Mr. President, that I will move a reconsideration of the vote by which the conference report was adopted. I understand it was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The understanding of the Chair is that the conference report was not agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. The conference report, as I understand, was agreed to, but I have not the slightest objection to the vote by which it was agreed to being reconsidered. There is no disposition on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to secure action on any measure which is not understood, but I submit that, with 96 Senators, it is very difficult to make every Senator understand what is contained in the appropriation bills if he will not look at them. This conference report has been printed and has been lying on the desk of the Senator from Nevada, I presume, as it has been on the desks of other Senators. So I suggest now that Senators examine the report sufficiently so that at some time we may have it taken up and acted upon.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under that understanding——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the understanding of the Chair that the report has not been agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well. I misunderstood the Senator from Wyoming. I will say that to-morrow morning I will be prepared to present to the Senate the matter which I have in mind.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator understands that the subjects which the Senate is considering in open executive session and which are privileged keep us waiting here for days at a time to secure action upon measures which ought to be transmitted to the other House in order that further proceedings may be had between the House and the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that, and that is one reason why I want the report to go over. I desire to be attending to this business, so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. DIAL. Will the Senator from Maryland yield to me that I may offer a resolution?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

CAUSES OF DEPRESSED PRICE OF COTTON.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I desire to offer a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. If there is any objection to it, I shall not press it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read as in legislative session.

The resolution (S. Res. 262) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby requested to investigate the cause, or causes, of the present depressed price of cotton in the United States, and especially with reference to cotton exchanges' operations; to ascertain their methods and plans of operation and to secure any and all data that may be available in connection therewith; whether trading carried on by such exchanges is done in a fair, just, and legal way, and whether, in its opinion, the present laws operate equitably to the grower of cotton, or whether they are in any way prejudicial; and that it consider in connection with said investigation stocks of raw cotton now on hand in the United States and elsewhere, yearly world consumption for 1919, 1920, and estimates for 1921, and the imports and exports of raw cotton into and from the United States; that it ascertain the quantity of linters, untenderable and unspinnable cotton in the United States; that it ascertain the size of the cotton crop in the United States for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921, and the number of contracts said to have been sold on each of such exchanges during each of said years herein mentioned, together with amount of cotton delivered on contract; that in the event it finds remedial legislation necessary, either in the manner of making or executing contracts or otherwise incident to such trading, that it so inform the Senate concerning such facts, with such recommendation as it may believe feasible to make.

Mr. DIAL. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in legislative session, the Sentor from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DIAL. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

NAVAL ARMAMENT TREATY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreeing to a limitation of naval armament.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say but a few words in explanation of my vote upon the pending treaty. It is not pleasant for me to mar the beautiful picture of harmony which would have been created by a unanimous vote in ratification of the pending treaty, but I shall vote against it. I shall stand in the minority here in the Senate, but, standing in the minority here, I believe that I shall stand with the overwhelming majority of the American people.

When innumerable doves of peace are beating the air with obedient wings, when all our senses are being enchanted with the intoxicating harmonies of universal pacifism, when we have recently surveyed floating from our public buildings the flags of the great empires of the earth in places of equal honor with the incomparable flag of this Republic, the first prophet and last defender of liberty, it is not pleasant for me to disturb the perfect harmony by rising here to remind the Senate that languishing in prison cells, under sentences of extraordinary severity, are men convicted under a Federal statute of the crime of pacifism.

When the greatest assault in history was being made upon the institutions of liberty by one of the mighty empires of Europe these men, standing in the minority, painted the horrors of war. They dwelt upon its inhumanity. They called attention to the crime of the shedding of one man's blood by another. They extolled the beauties of universal brotherhood, universal love, and universal peace, and for that, under a Federal statute clearly out of harmony with the Constitution of the United States, they were convicted of the then newly created crime of pacifism and were cast into prison where to-day they languish. And now men are taking to-day, even in the legislative halls of the Republic, the positions which those men took.

I believe that those men were unjustly convicted. I believe they should be freed, but I believe they were mistaken—mistaken, however, when they were exercising the constitutional right of every man who is a citizen of this Republic to express the minority, even if the repugnant, opinion. But they were doing then what is being done now to-day. They were preaching pacifism. Now, to my mind pacifism is nothing less than the doctrine which desires peace at any price. It is the doctrine which says, "Let us have peace regardless of the terms of that peace." Pacifism is for peace and for disarmament even when injustice is in the saddle and when the iron hoofs of empire are crushing the anguished hearts and trampling upon the inalienable rights of men.

I am not a pacifist. I do not believe that any progress can be made in the direction of disarmament, in the direction of doing away with the settlement of international disputes by force, until there shall be set up some different method of settling international disputes, until there shall be some international tribunal where oppressions, wrongs, and injustice can be remedied and where the oppressed can find redress.

Loathing war as I do, looking forward fondly as I do to the time when there shall be set up international tribunals for the establishment of international justice, I shall vote against the pending treaty. I shall vote against it because that time has not come. I must confess, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was indicating a few moments ago, to certain twinges of conscience with reference to my attitude upon the League of Nations when I contemplate this new international arrangement which is far less satisfactory. The League of Nations at least pretended to set up a tribunal of justice which should take the place of force in the settlement of international disputes, but under this arrangement we are offered disarmament with no substitute whatever in the way of an international tribunal designed to give us justice.

Mr. President, I am surprised at much of the shallow thought of the statesmanship of our time. It seems not to have ever occurred to some of the statesmen who have been studying the problems of peace, of war, and of disarmament that armaments are not the disease, that great armies and great navies and great guns are not what ails the world, that these are not in themselves the disease, but that they are only the symptoms of the disease and that those symptoms will persist until the disease is cured. Of course, the disease is nothing else than international injustice and oppression. Loving peace as I do, I love liberty, progress, and justice far more. I do not wish to see disarmament, I do not wish to see the navies disappear until I can be assured that there may be set up the means by which justice may be secured and by which the progress of liberty throughout the world may be made more certain.

I want to say to the Members of the Senate and I want to say to the Members of the House of Representatives that the people of the United States understand this question better, I believe, than do their representatives. The people of the United States love the American Navy. Throw upon the screen of any moving-picture palace or theater of humbler degree in any part of the Republic the animated picture of great American battleships bravely plowing the turbulent waters of the ocean, bearing the Stars and Stripes, representative not only of the wealth, the majesty, and the power of this great Republic, but of its invincible devotion to the higher ideals of liberty, and from the spectators, whose hearts beat true to American traditions, there will arise tumultuous applause. The American people love the American Navy. They realize that it is their first line of defense. They realize that with their great wealth the support of this Navy is an insignificant burden upon them. They realize, further, that our Navy will never be used to promote injustice or oppression, and that it will always be used in the defense of the American ideals of emancipation, of elevation, of liberation.

I shall vote against the ratification of this treaty; and from having noted an actual canvass in my State made some time ago by one of the newspapers, I am convinced that the people of Maryland—a State which has done so much for the Navy, not only in contributing to the great Navy of the United States heroes of years past and of more recent days, but in contributing at Annapolis every year a magnificant class of young midshipmen—are opposed to the crippling of our splendid Navy. I know that they will trust the Republic. I know that the people of the United States believe that this Republic should have the most powerful Navy in the world as a first wall of defense for the protection of our own liberties and as the great benevolent right arm to be always extended for conciliation, for propitiation, for mercy, for humanity, for liberty, and for justice over all the peoples of the world.

Oh, Mr. President, what a prophet was the Father of our Country when he warned us against the insidious wiles of foreign influence! How insidious are these influences! Is there an American Senator or an American Representative or an American citizen who believes that our financial condition is such that we can not afford to support the largest Navy in the world? I do not know of such a one. It was not long since that all of our newspapers, before the insidious influence of foreign lands began to operate, were speaking proudly of our great achievements in building up a Navy. As an illustration of that, I desire to close my remarks with an editorial from the Washington Post of December 23, 1920, which, to my mind, reads like good, old-fashioned Americanism; an Americanism still held by such reactionary old gentlemen as myself; an Americanism which will be held by this reactionary old gentleman, he hopes, until he is consigned to his eternal rest, perhaps with the flag draped about him in some recognition of what he has tried to do in maintaining and defending the ideals of this Republic. From the Washington Post of only a year ago I read this editorial:

AMERICAN SUPREMACY AT SEA.

Within three years the United States will hold supremacy over the seas. After 300 years of undisputed supremacy, the British Navy will take second place and the Stars and Stripes will float over a fleet stronger than the two fleets that fought the Battle of Jutland. In number of ships, in number of guns, and in size of guns and weight of broadsides the American fleet will be overwhelmingly superior to the British fleet. The two navies will stand about as follows in 1924, counting capital ships only:

	Great Britain.	United States.
Ships	18	27
Displacement, tons	487,450	983,000
Heaviest guns, inch	15	16
Greatest speed, knots	31.50	33.25

Japan is building eight capital ships and by 1924 will be a promising rival of Great Britain. Indeed, some naval experts are of opinion that the Japanese fleet by that year will be more effective than the British, although the British fleet will excel in tonnage. A point to be borne in mind is that while the American and Japanese ships are new, the British vessels are of an older pattern. No first-class capital ship has been laid down in Europe since the war began, while the United States and Japan have been building up their navies quite actively. The program adopted in 1916 in the United States provided for 157 ships of various types. Among them are 4 battleships of 32,600 tons each and 6 battleships of 43,200 tons each, besides six battle cruisers of 35,300 tons each, with a greater speed than any similar vessels afloat or planned.

Japan's program calls for 24 capital ships, of which at least 8 will be of the latest type, equal to those of any other fleet. Japan's spokesmen announce that the Empire can not halt its shipbuilding program while the United States continues to increase its fleet, and it is recognized that the disparity of strength will be in favor of the United States in spite of all that Japan can do.

There is no reason to look for a cessation of American naval increase. President-elect Harding has in fact already announced his policy, in his speech at Norfolk upon his return from Panama. He favors a Navy and a merchant marine second to no other in the world.

I will say that this is not a criticism of the President, because the President believes that under this plan we shall have a Navy second to none in the world, and, therefore, a Navy in harmony with what he said upon this occasion:

Therefore he will not interpose objections to a reasonable continuation of the expansion program, and certainly he can not be expected to cut down the program adopted in 1916 and now in process of execution.

The resources of Great Britain and the disturbed conditions in the British Isles do not seem to encourage a great naval increase. Hence it need not be apprehended that the United States will fail to take first place by 1924, or perhaps by 1923.

Premier Lloyd-George took occasion only yesterday to discuss the question of disarmament. Speaking to the British and imperial delegates to the League of Nations, he said there could never be real peace until the nations ceased competition in armament and until all nations were in the League of Nations, for all nations must act together in this matter. No nation dares to take the risk of disarmament unless all will agree to disarm.

Of course, Mr. President, when Mr. Lloyd-George said that he overlooked, as have all the statesmen of the world recently overlooked, the fundamental principle to which I have called attention, the principle that to attempt to get rid of the symptom until you cure the disease is the utmost of folly. All the armies of to-day might be disbanded, all of the battleships might be scrapped, but if oppression and injustice remained new methods of warfare would be invented. From the beginning of the world men have fought, generally on the one side fighting against injustice and oppression and on the other side fighting for self-aggrandizement, exploitation, and oppression. Men have fought since the beginning of time. They fought with stones; they fought with stone weapons; with bronze-tipped spears; they defended themselves with shields made of hides; they fought in canoes; they fought, after gunpowder was first discovered, with makeshift arms; and now they fight with vast machinery of the utmost perfection and power of destruction. If all the navies of the world should be destroyed to-morrow, and the reason for those navies should remain, we would still have conflicts just as deadly, just as destructive, between merchant ships carrying guns.

Some one has said that in the old days we had wooden ships and iron men, while to-day we have iron ships and wooden men. That is not true of the American Navy. The American Navy is made up of iron men, with courage in their blood, with patriotism in their hearts, and with a knowledge of world conditions which constitute those men among the best prepared in this Republic to know what our naval policy should be; and generally they are opposed to this wholly irrational scheme.

But scrap the big battle cruisers and the big dreadnoughts of the world and then let one imperial nation attempt to take advantage of a weaker but honest competitor in the markets of the world, and before we know it merchantmen will be carrying guns, and great disasters like the Lusitania disaster, one of the most terrible in all the history of the world, will have their repetition.

Mr. President, I am not surprised that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] feels that the rejection of the League of Nations plan, which, at least, attempted to substitute an international tribunal of justice for force, was a mistake and that that plan should have been accepted rather than this. The editorial continues:

These statements, like all others that have appeared on the subject, omit one all-important qualification. Everything depends upon the nation that is superior in arms. If it is determined to have peace, it can have peace instead of war.

Here is the essence of the whole matter. I challenge any Senator or any Representative in Congress to go out upon the streets or to talk, as I do when I have occasion, with his farmer neighbor across the fence and ask him whether a nation should have a large navy. I am sure if a Senator will ask his neighbor at home whether a nation should have a big navy or not the average neighbor would answer very much in this language:

Everything depends upon the nation that is superior in arms. If it is determined to have peace, it can have peace instead of war. We deny—

And the average American will deny, as was denied a year ago by the editor of the Post—

We deny that superiority in armament makes a nation warlike or that competition in armaments drives nations into armed conflict. Great Britain herself is a witness against Mr. Lloyd-George. The British Navy is supreme on the seas, and yet Great Britain does not provoke war. She did not start the World War, although her navy was armed to the teeth and could have defeated Germany by a sudden stroke at any time before the completion of the Kiel Canal.

The strongest army in the world in 1919 was the United States Army. But it did not seek war. The possession of enormous armed strength on land and sea did not make the United States a whit more warlike than during the seemingly pacifist years 1914–1916. Who is the American who believes that in 1924, when the United States will possess the greatest Navy afloat, this Nation will seek war? We believe the United States will use its Navy to promote peace, as the British Navy has been used.

The most important part of Mr. Lloyd-George's observation is that which makes it clear that the nations do not trust one another.

Mr. President, there is still some slight evidence of this condition to-day, even after the great disarmament conference; a condition under which the nations do not trust one another.

That is a solid, incontrovertible fact, a fact that outweighs the mountains of theories concerning brotherhoods, leagues, and peace based on loving confidence. Not trusting one another, the nations must retain their independence and their strength. So far as the well-meaning and reliable nations can cooperate for the world's welfare, well and good; but they have traitors and assassins among them, and therefore they dare not depend upon leagues as substitutes for armies and navies.

The United States craves the privilege of cooperating with enlightened and free nations for the sake of all mankind. At the same time, seeing the world as it is, and not as it might appear through rainbow-tinted spectacles, the United States uses its resources in its own defense. As this Nation contains most of the world's wealth and as its resources are the greatest in the world, it is proper that the United States Navy should be the most powerful in the world.

This is an editorial from the Washington Post of a year ago.

Mr. President, it is not many years since Great Britain, under the hysteria of a pacifist movement there, was almost persuaded to do what we shall do when we ratify this treaty. A great naval expert of Great Britain, a man who has since been highly honored by the Empire, called attention to the grave danger which might confront the Empire within a few short years if she should adopt the policy which we are adopting to-day, when, with war threatening, I say, from many directions, we are preparing to scrap so much of our great—real and proposed—Navy. He warned them, I say, as to the danger which might confront Great Britain in a few years if she adopted a policy of drastic naval reduction. By a very narrow margin the contrary policy was adopted, and the great British fleet was preserved; but if it had not been for the courage and for the vision of that Briton who refused to be swept from his feet by an unreasoning hysteria of pacifism the history of the last war would have been very different, and the future course of history would have been in a totally different direction.

I believe that we should build our Navy. I believe that we should go on to complete our 1916 program. I believe that the great institutions of liberty upon the Western Continent will face grave dangers during the next decade. I believe that we should be prepared with ships and men to defend the American ideal and the American flag against the menacing dangers of the great empires of the world, which hate with a deep, abiding hatred which will never die as long as the imperial system lives the very system and ideals of Americanism, which are in conflict with everything for which the empires stand.

There is not one of those great empires which would not crush the life out of the American ideal and the American system if it could—an ideal and a system which, unless they be destroyed, will march steadily on with irresistible conquering force until the ideals and system of imperialism have been wiped from the earth, which for so many centuries has been stained and cursed by them.

I shall vote against this treaty if I vote alone, and I shall wait for the patient years to vindicate my vote; and I know that the majority of the American people fully realize that this policy, which is indeed a sudden reversal of a well and long considered policy—this policy of scrapping so much of the great American Navy at the very moment when that Navy was coming to a position where it would have held supremacy of the seas—is a grave mistake.

As far as I am concerned, I can vote "nay" with perfect confidence that my vote is the proper vote, and if that unhappy time shall ever come, which I pray God may not be, when we shall be menaced by a combination of the empires which hate us, if we shall be unprepared the blood, the havoc, the destruction shall not be charged to me nor to my record as a Member of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FRANCE subsequently said:

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks this morning two resolutions which I introduced, being a resolution of January 14, 1919, for the calling of an international conference, and a resolution of April 12, 1921, providing for an international conference and consultation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

JANUARY 14, 1919.

[Senate resolution 412, by Mr. FRANCE.]

Whereas on the 11th day of November, 1918, the President of the United States announced the signing of an armistice between the United States and the Central Powers, against which this Nation had been at war, the President at that time declaring, "The war thus comes to an end"; and

Whereas it has not as yet come to the knowledge of the Senate of the United States that peace negotiations have been entered into with the enemy; and

Whereas the keeping for any length of time of an American Army upon European soil is undesirable and a cause of vast expense and of deep anxiety to the American people; and

Whereas profound unrest among the people of many nations and violent revolutions in several countries, which spirit of unrest and revolution are augmented by the hardships resulting from the maintenance of armies of occupation, and by that underproduction, throughout the world, of the necessities and commodities of life which has resulted from the long withholding of many millions of men from productive industry must be a cause for deep concern on the part of the several Governments: Therefore be it

Resolved, First. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that, at the very earliest possible moment, negotiations be entered into with the enemy looking to the establishment of a just peace, and that all subsidiary questions which might delay the establishment of such a just peace between the nations, without which peace national stability is everywhere endangered, may be postponed for a later discussion at an international conference.

Second. That the Senate, as part of the treaty-making power of the Government, does hereby consent to and most earnestly advise that at the earliest possible moment consistent with the safety of this Nation American troops be returned from Europe; and, further, that after the establishment of peace the President call upon the Governments of North and South America to appoint two delegates each to an international conference, to be held at some suitable time and place, to consider plans for the closer cooperation of these Governments in promoting justice, progress, and friendship among and within the said countries of the Western Continent; and, further, that the President also, at some time subsequent to this conference of the American Republics, call upon all the nations to appoint delegates to another international conference to be held at some suitable time and place to discuss and consider plans for the promotion of justice, progress, and friendship among and within the nations of the world, such conference to particularly discuss and consider plans for the removal, so far as may be, of the economic and social causes of war, and to this end particularly give attention to—

First. The congestion of population of some nations.

Second. The underpopulation of other nations.

Third. The unregulated competition between the more populous and industrial countries for the raw products and trade of the less populous and agricultural ones.

Fourth. The exploitation of the weaker and the less advanced by the stronger and more highly organized nations.

Fifth. A larger self-determination of peoples and nations.

Sixth. The possibility of the cooperation of the more advanced nations, for the improvement of the conditions of the backward countries, particularly those of Africa and parts of Asia, by the formulation of plans for the reclamation of waste lands, for the utilization of natural resources, including water powers, for wise colonization, for education, and for the spread of civilization, in the interest of those countries and of the world.

Seventh. The best means for the wider and more rapid extension of education and civilization throughout the world, looking to the ultimate elimination of national, racial, and religious antagonisms.

Eighth. The establishment of constitutional republics or of governments of such uniformity throughout the world as would make for that national stability upon which could be based a permanent international order.

Ninth. The elimination of all causes of national enmities and the establishment of friendship and justice between the nations, with a view to the ultimate establishment of a league of nations or world federation of republics, for the purpose of promoting the cause of progress and of peace throughout the earth.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 12, 1921.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 10) providing for the reestablishment of peace and the calling of an international conference to institute a concert of nations to advise concerning international cooperation as a substitute for the League of Nations.

Whereas on the 11th day of November, 1918, the President of the United States announced the signing of an armistice between the United States and the powers with which the United States had been at war, the President at that time declaring "the war thus comes to an end"; and

Whereas it is most desirable that there shall be a prompt termination of the status of war by the formal legal reestablishment of peace between the United States and Germany; and

Whereas the peace treaty has failed to receive the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate; one of the reasons for the negative action being that more than one-third of the Senate hold that the covenant of the League of Nations incorporated in said treaty, if adopted by the United States, would contravene its fundamental principles as declared in the Declaration of Independence by subjecting the external relations of the United States to the control of a foreign body not recognizing these principles, would violate the Constitution by attempting to change the form of government of the United States without a constitutional amendment, and would ignore and tend to destroy the right of States under the law of nations to defend themselves and to extend civilization in behalf of all civilized nations by means of war when other means are impossible; and

Whereas there is a profound unrest throughout the world, due in large part to the failure of the Paris peace conference to formulate such plans for peace and for international cooperation for the advancement of justice, liberty, and the general welfare as would commend itself to the great liberal spirit of the age and the new enlightened conscience of mankind; and

Whereas the long-continued underproduction and rapid destruction during the war of the necessities and commodities of life, particularly of food, have resulted in a serious shortage, which makes imperatively necessary an immediate reorganization of all agricultural, industrial, financial, and commercial activities for the maximum production in all countries and for the distribution among the nations by the normal methods of trade and commerce of such food, necessities, and commodities; and

Whereas because of the close community of financial, industrial, and commercial interests of all of the nations of the world, the industrial and financial prostration and paralysis of Germany, Austria, Russia, and other recently belligerent countries of Europe, with the necessarily ensuing unemployment, impoverishment, and starvation of their citizens, with the threatened unrest and revolution in certain of these countries, are impeding the rehabilitation and are menacing the peace of the world and the stability of all governments; and

Whereas, therefore, it is desirable to bring about immediately a situation of general peace and to take measures for establishing at the earliest practicable moment a form of international organization, approved by the public sentiment of the people of the United States, to deal with the social and economic problems growing out of the present war, and to bring about as nearly peaceful relations as possible between States by judicious and carefully wrought out measures of international cooperation; and

Whereas those opposing the plan of international organization contained in the covenant of the League of Nations recognize that it has now become necessary for the United States to cooperate methodically and permanently with the States and countries of the world and to take the lead in establishing a concert of nations to direct such cooperation by considered advice, but have heretofore been confined to an indirect and imperfect expression of their views by means of reservations to the said covenant proposed in the Senate: Now, therefore, in order to promote a general pacification, to declare the plan of international organization approved by those opposed to the plan of the League of Nations, be it

Resolved, etc., That the status of war with Germany, declared by the Congress by Senate Joint Resolution No. 1, on the 5th day of April, 1917, be, and it is hereby, declared to be terminated and the full status of peace be, and it is hereby, declared to be reestablished.

2. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and advised to make treaties of peace without annexations or indemnities and of trade and intercourse with the Republic of Germany, all matters of dispute between the two countries to be submitted for arbitration to The Hague tribunal.

3. That in pursuance of this resolution declaring the reestablishment of peace all American troops now upon foreign soil shall be immediately returned to the United States.

4. That the President is hereby authorized and directed, by invitations to be sent out by him during the month of June, 1921, to invite the States signatory of or adherent to the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, of July 24, 1899, and their successors, and all other States since recognized or which may be recognized prior to the sending out of the invitations to send three delegates each and also two delegates in behalf of each of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, respectively, of the various States having colonies, protectorates, or dependencies, to assemble at Washington, on a date in September, 1921, to be fixed in the invitation, to consult concerning the formation of a more perfect general concert and union, the establishment of general justice, the assurance of the general tranquillity, the promotion of the general welfare, and the securing generally of the blessings of liberty to the peoples now living and to their posterity.

5. That the list of said States to be invited shall include the following: Argentine Republic, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hedjaz, Hungary, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Yugoslavia, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Persia, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Russia, Salvador, Serbia, Siam, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Uruguay, and Venezuela.

6. That the invitations shall expressly state that the motive of the United States in issuing them is to initiate and bring about a concert of nations as a substitute for the League of Nations and shall be expressly with the understandings as herein set forth, namely: There shall be an international conference of the States, composed of three delegates from each of the States, and an assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, composed of two delegates from each of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, the international conference and the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies to sit separately but at the same time. The assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies shall deliberate exclusively concerning social and economic measures and shall report to the international conference. The international conference and the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies shall be the first of a series of periodical conferences and assemblies of similar character, meeting at periods of three years at places determined by the international conferences. The general object of the conferences and assemblies shall be to constitute a concert of the States and countries of the world on the general lines of the international conference of American States and the inter-American high commission, by means of central and national institutions and processes adapted to carry on orderly discussion, deliberation, and judgment concerning matters of common interest with a view to inducing such peaceful and voluntary action of the States in the common interest as may be needful to bring about international cooperation. All resolutions agreed upon either in the international conference or in the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies shall be of an advisory character, and any international or pannational organs or processes initiated or instituted shall be of a voluntary nature and shall have only advisory powers. The international conferences shall establish and maintain a system of advisory correspondence, with continuation committees sitting in the intervals between the conferences to prepare for the international conferences and the assemblies of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies and to carry on the system of correspondence. The more specific objects of the international conference, of the assembly of colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, and of the continuation committees, and the purpose of the correspondence between the States participating shall be—

(a) To consider the common and mutual interests and the social and economic relations of the States and peoples of the world as naturally and necessarily united for mutual aid and benefit and to recommend such projects of uniformity or reciprocity in the action of the States, respectively, as will enable them to cooperate for the general welfare.

(b) To formulate a body of international law based on the security of the fundamental rights of the individual as the prime function of all Governments and for applying as between States the analogies of the laws of partnership and cotenancy, and as between States and their respective colonies, protectorates, and dependencies the analogies of the laws of conservatorship, guardianship, and trusteeship.

(c) To devise methods for the advancement of the peoples of colonies, protectorates, or dependencies from the status of dependence to that of independence and to full participation in the international conferences.

(d) To decide concerning the admission into the international conferences of any communities claiming to be States formed by the division of existing States or by the junction of States or parts of States.

(e) To promote cooperation among the more advanced nations for the improvement and advancement of the backward countries and territories, particularly those of Africa and parts of Asia, by the formulation of plans for the reclamation of waste land, for the utilization of natural resources, including water powers, for wise colonization, for the promotion of education and the spread of civilization throughout the world.

(f) To consider the problems of the congestion of some and the underpopulation of other nations and the unregulated competition between the more populous and industrial countries for the trade and raw products of the less populous agricultural ones.

(g) To study the problem of international finance, credits, and exchange with a view to the prompt shipment on suitable credits, particularly into Russia, Germany, Austria, China, Africa, and any other agriculturally or industrially undeveloped or prostrated countries, of tools, agricultural implements, seeds, and other materials necessary to production, as well as foodstuffs, necessities, and commodities, for the purpose of encouraging a resumption of production which will be favorable to the rehabilitation of the world.

(h) To localize hostilities between States by cooperative policing of the high seas of otherwise and to take such action in case of such hostilities that the result of any armed conflict between States may be to increase the area within which the rights of the individual are effectively secured and to render more perfect the union of all the States for mutual aid and benefit.

(i) To make further provision for the pacific settlement of international disputes and for the settlement of such disputes according to accepted principles of law and by due process of law; and for this purpose to establish an international supreme court of justice and a system of inferior international courts having jurisdiction of controversies between States in which the parties in interest are citizens of different States, and also of such controversies between States in their own right as may be susceptible of decision by application of accepted principles of public or private law.

(j) To encourage the establishment, where stable governments do not exist, of constitutional republics or governments of such character as would make for that national stability upon which would be based a permanently peaceful international order, and to promote the institution in each nation of appropriate national agencies of international correspondence and concert and the control by national legislatures of the appointment and instruction of national delegates to the international conferences.

(k) To promote amity and mutual understanding between the oriental and occidental peoples and to proceed with all possible means and speed to conciliate the people of Russia, China, India, Afghanistan, the Central Powers, and Turkey, in order that these nations or countries may not form against the western powers a hostile coalition which might menace the peace of the world.

7. That the President is hereby further authorized and directed, by invitations to be sent out by him during the month of June, 1921, to invite each of the aforesaid States to send five delegates, to be selected from the organized labor bodies of each of said States, to an international conference on labor to be held at Washington at the same time with the international conference of the States and the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, said international conference on labor to sit concurrently with, but separate from and independent of, the international conference of the States and the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies. This international conference on labor may send communications to and advise with the other two aforesaid conferences. It shall be the function of the international conference on labor to consider and deliberate upon all questions affecting the general welfare of labor throughout the world and to make recommendations to the international conference of the States and to the assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies of measures which, in the opinion of the international conference on labor, would tend to promote the establishment of general justice, the assurance of the general tranquillity, the promotion of the general welfare, and the securing generally of the blessings of liberty to the peoples now living and to their posterity.

8. That the functions of the United States as the initiator and host of the international conference of the States, of assembly of the colonies, protectorates, and dependencies, and of the international conference on labor shall be in the charge of a committee which shall come into existence in the month of May, 1921, and shall consist of the then Secretary of State as chairman, the then Secretary of the Treasury, the then Secretary of Commerce, two Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The delegation of the United States to the international conference and to the assembly shall be nominated to the President by said organization committee and said nominees when approved by the President shall be appointed by him by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The said organization committee shall also suggest to the first international conference and to the first assembly a plan for their organization, a program of matters to be considered, a project for regulating the action of the continuation committees, and a plan for organizing and regulating the central and national agencies of correspondence and concert; but nothing in the plans, project, or program so suggested shall be inconsistent with the provisions of this resolution.

9. That the general expenses of the international conference and of the assembly shall be borne by the United States, each participating State, however, paying the salaries and expenses of its own delegates and of the delegates in behalf of its colonies, protectorates, and dependencies.

10. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any sums in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the carrying out of the provisions of this resolution the sum of $500,000.

11. That the provisions of this resolution shall take effect immediately after its passage and its approval by the President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], let me say that in the summary of the work of the League of Nations at the conclusion of my speech in the Senate on Wednesday, October 5, 1921, which summary was republished in yesterday's RECORD at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I find that the eleventh item—the item relating to disarmament—should have included the fact that the last assembly of the league, which met at Geneva on September 5, 1921, directed the league's committee on disarmament to prepare a general plan of disarmament for presentation to the next assembly, which meets this year, the nations to furnish inventories of existing armaments, with a statement of cost. This last assembly also recommended an international conference on restriction of the manufacture of arms and condemned the use of poison gas in war. It recommeded that world-wide propaganda be instituted for disarmament.

It will be seen, therefore, that the league is developing a broad and comprehensive plan for disarmament—disarmament on land, disarmament on sea, disarmament in air—a plan embracing nearly all the nations of the world. It will be seen further that the statement that the league has done nothing toward disarmament is without foundation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have not heretofore discussed any of these treaties, and in the consideration of this particular treaty there has been little discussion on this side, for the reason we were anxious to cooperate with those who were steering it through the Senate, that a vote might be taken at the earliest possible moment.

There is no partisanship in the consideration of these treaties, nor was there any in the Conference on the Limitation of Armament. I hardly believe there was ever held a conference so free of politics as this one. While it was called by a Republican President and three of the four delegates representing this Government happened to be members of the majority party, so far as I have heard politics did not creep into it; and, that being true, it has been to some of us a matter of regret that certain Republican spokesmen high in the councils of the party—one holding the second highest official position in the service of the Government have seen fit recently to claim it as a great administrative or Republican achievement. The chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, whether he employed those words or not, conveyed that meaning; and the Vice President, in his speech on Sunday, which was reported throughout the country, claims it in the first paragraph as a great administrative achievement.

Mr. President, I am speaking now in behalf of this treaty not as a Democrat but as an American. We on this side of the aisle who did oppose the four-power pact did so with regret.

It was not because we desired to prolong the discussion of it or to vote against it that the fight was waged here, that the suggestions of modifications were offered and the amendments or reservations proposed. We earnestly and sincerely hoped that the treaty might be so framed that we could give it our support. From the beginning to the end we have desired that the result of the disarmament conference might be such that it would be acceptable to representatives on both sides of the aisle, and we were indeed sorry that at least one reservation was not accepted to the four-power pact, so that we might have been permitted in the end to vote for it.

We were against that pact because we believed it to be an alliance of the four great powers. We believed it to lay the germs of distrust amongst other nations and be a breeder of wars. We believed that the four powers who joined in the pact should agree to respect the rights of other nations, great or small, the same as according to the terms of the treaty, they were to respect the rights of the parties to the treaty. We believed that it should have been amended so that not only would we be compelled to refrain from all acts of aggression as against the other parties to the treaty and they as against us, but that we and the other powers to the pact by its terms would agree to refrain from all acts of aggression against other powers which might not be named in the pact. We desired that the treaty might be amended so that if a controversy should arise in the Pacific other nations interested than the four nations named in the pact might be invited into the conference that their views might be presented, and that this Government might then take sides in the interest of right and justice as presented in the controversy, without guaranty or obligation upon our part.

It was because such reservations were not included in the four-power pact that the great majority of Democratic Senators in the end voted against it. I have no doubt that if a reservation such as that proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], carrying out the suggestions I have just referred to, had been adopted by the Senate there would not have been half a dozen votes against the final ratification of that treaty. So, Mr. President, the opposition to the four-power pact was not partisan; it was solely in the interest of peace, against "entangling alliances," and toward a good understanding among all nations. I would not have the country get the impression that because there were quite a number of us who voted against the four-power pact there was any partisanship in it or that there was any lack of sincere interest in the success of the disarmament conference.

Sirs, no better proof could be offered that there was no partisanship during the disarmament conference or since the treaties have been presented here than the fact that from the time the conference met until it adjourned no voice was lifted on this side in criticism of the work of the conference. We held our tongues. We wished it well. We tried to cooperate to the fullest extent in having that conference succeed, and I dare say that no member of the delegation representing this Government rendered more splendid service than the Democratic member of that delegation, the leader of the Democrats in this body Mr. UNDERWOOD.

When gentlemen of the opposing party go out upon the hustings from now on until the coming election, proclaiming these treaties as a great achievement of the present administration, I would have those who hear them proclaim that doctrine recall the facts which prompted the convening of the disarmament conference.

I would have those hearers remember how, when other treaties were presented—and that was not very long ago—to this body, the discussion was strung out for days, for weeks, into the months, and almost into years, before the final action was taken. Nothing like that was evidenced in the consideration of these treaties. Indeed, this side of the aisle, through a majority of the minority who opposed the four-power pact in its original form, tried in every way to amend it by reservations or otherwise, to carry out the ideas I have just suggested; we tried to shorten the discussion and we agreed, with only a few weeks' debate, to vote upon the treaty. Unanimous consent was obtained, and the treaty was hastened to its ratification, even though there was very strong opposition to it.

Those who in the coming months hear these spellbinders proclaim that this is an achievement of this administration and of the Republican Party should remember that within less than 48 hours after the naval treaty was presented to the Senate for consideration a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into to vote upon it within less than 50 hours after it was presented, and when the roll is called there will be as few Democrats as Republicans casting their votes against it. It will be ratified almost unanimously. So we are still cooperating and trying to expedite the ratification of these treaties which in our opinion justify it, and the course which is to be pursued as to the other treaties which are to come along, three or four in number, I believe will show the same degree of cooperation and support from this side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, it can not be charged that there is any partisanship in the consideration of these treaties.

As to the history of the matter, what right have the Republicans to claim this treaty, if there is any good in it, as an administration achievement or a Republican achievement? I agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that much work lies ahead for us to do toward reducing these large expenditures for the building of armaments, both for the Navy and upon land; that the work is just begun. I agree with him that the success of this conference is not as great as we had hoped for. I am sorry that we are not called upon to ratify a treaty limiting land armament. I am sorry that the treaty pertaining to gases does not go further and prevent their manufacture. I am sorry that there is not a treaty here to prevent the building of submarines and other smaller naval craft. But they are not here. So far as they were concerned, the conference did fail; but this treaty now pending is no doubt the best the American delegates could obtain. It is better than nothing. It does provide for a 10-year naval holiday so far as the building of capital ships are concerned, and will be some saving to the American taxpayer. So I am for it, and enthusiastically for it, and I am sure that that sentiment is entertained by practically every Senator on this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, this conference was called for the limitation of armaments, and in the first call there was nothing said about a four-power alliance; indeed, I suppose the thought had never been conceived. So those in the country who are prone to criticize those of us who opposed the original four-power pact must know that it was not in the original call, had no place in the conference, and the suggestions offered by us to it were of a constructive rather than destructive character—intended to eliminate its highly objectionable features and make it helpful instead of harmful.

Mr. President, what right has anyone who belongs to the party which to-day is in the ascendency here to claim the results of the conference as an achievement? Are the Republicans not willing to admit that those of us who have been for the plan all the time did something to bring it about? The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was indeed modest when he said that the author of the disarmament conference resolution was public opinion. Yes; it was public opinion, but the two men who crystallized public opinion in this country and forced the Congress, as well as the President, to call the disarmament conference were the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the ex-President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. It was those two men who popularized the idea and influenced public opinion to force the passage of the disarmament resolution and the calling of the disarmament conference.

I am reminded by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] of what happened in a Democratic conference before this conference proceeded with its work. In that conference, made up of Democratic Senators, I had the pleasure of offering a resolution wishing for the disarmament conference complete success, and in order that the country may know that from start to finish we on this side were at heart for the success of the disarmament conference, I want to take time to read a resolution which was unanimously adopted in the conference of Democratic Senators on September 28, 1921, after the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had been appointed as one of the delegates. The resolution was embodied in an article in the New York Tribune, which reads as follows:

SENATE DEMOCRATS VOTE SUCCESS TO ARMS PARLEY—RESOLUTION ALSO EXPRESSES GRATIFICATION AT SELECTION OF UNDERWOOD.

[From The Tribune's Washington bureau.]

WASHINGTON, September 29.—Senate Democrats, in conference today, adopted by unanimous vote a resolution offered by Senator HARRISON, of Mississippi, expressing the hope that the Conference on Limitation of Armament would succeed, and also expressing gratification that Senator UNDERWOOD had been named as a delegate. The resolution follows:

"Whereas it has been a principle of the Democratic Party, for which its leaders have worked, to reduce taxes through limiting large expenditures for armaments:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this conference that the fullest measure of success attend the disarmament conference called by President Harding to meet in the city of Washington on November 11, 1921; and

"Further expresses its gratification at the selection as a member of the conference representing the Government of the United States the Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, the leader of the Democratic minority in the Senate, whose broad statesmanship and sincere advocacy of disarmament and wise counsel amply qualify him as an ideal representative."

So, Mr. President, in the consideration of this treaty, in agreeing to this unanimous consent to vote to-day at 3 o'clock, with but little less than 12 hours for discussion of the great questions involved in it, we have been carrying out the wish and hope of the Democratic Party throughout the country as expressed in this conference of Democratic Senators months ago.

I would not have the country forget that it was back in 1912 when a Democratic Member of the House of Representatives, Mr. Hensley, proposed and had adopted in the House a resolution expressing the hope that some plan might be evolved disarming the nations of the world. I would not have the country forget that in 1916, through Democratic committees in the House and in the Senate, there was incorporated in the naval appropriation bill the idea and the plan of calling a conference for disarmament.

I would not have them forget, either, that it was ex-President Wilson, fighting as no man had ever fought before, who had incorporated in the covenant of the League of Nations article 8, providing for a plan of disarmament.

I would not have them forget that the distinguished Democratic Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], on December 11, 1920, offered a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations just four days before the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] offered his celebrated resolution calling for a disarmament conference. I would not have them forget that it was the resolution of the distinguished Senator from Idaho which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and was voted down in the Committee on Naval Affairs by the Republican members of that committee who were then present, and that every Democratic member of the committee then present voted to report out the Borah resolution.

They should not forget, either, that as public opinion continued to crystallize the Senator from Idaho again offered his resolution, and it again went to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and again the Republican members of that committee voted unanimously against reporting the resolution, and again the Democratic members of the Committee on Naval Affairs voted favorably to report the resolution.

Ah, we will not forget how the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] fought for days and days when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration before the Senate to defeat the Borah resolution, which was offered as an amendment to the naval appropriation bill. The RECORD is full of the utterances of these Senators and others who were on the inside who knew that President Harding had sent the word "down the line" not to accept the Borah resolution in any form. During all this time and at every step the solid Democratic minority was supporting the Senator from Idaho in his efforts to have his resolution passed. It was only after the force of public opinion had moved you and moved the White House that the resolution was finally agreed upon, and as a result of it the disarmament conference was called by President Harding.

Mr. President, there can not be and there is not any politics in this. There should be no partisanship in it. We want to cooperate with you, as we have done in the past, to see these treaties move on out of the way. If you had accepted the suggestions offered on this side of the aisle when the four-power pact was up, as embodied in the Robinson amendment, there would have been little opposition to that pact, the country would have been better satisfied, and there would be little or no disgust now among those nations which are not parties to it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, there seems to have been a rather continuous effort on the part of a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to connect the accomplishments of the Washington conference with the activities or lack of activities of the League of Nations. The continued reference during the session of yesterday and during the session of to-day to the renewed activities of the League of Nations, coming at this time, would lead one to infer that there was a distinct relationship. To me it is amusing, if not pathetic, that they deem it necessary to emphasize the possible activities of the league as having any relationship whatsoever to the actual accomplishments of the Washington conference.

The fact remains, and it can not be successfully controverted, that the conference which met at Washington for approximately 10 weeks, participated in by the representatives of nine nations, accomplished by unanimous consent more in that time than has ever been accomplished by any international conference of any character and, in my judgment, even more than has heretofore ever been hoped for. Without a constitution, without a supergovernment, without a covenant of any kind, simply sitting around the table, authorized by their Governments to endeavor to reach agreements which would bring about at least a start toward disarmament, the delegates unanimously agreed and the results have been represented by the treaties which we have already ratified and are still considering.

The League of Nations may develop in the future some real, definite plan to contribute to the problem of disarmament. I do not know. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has suggested, I hope it can do so. It has been in existence for two or more years, and certainly it has had opportunities of all kinds and character because of the turbulent condition in Europe, yet what tangible agreement has resulted? True, the United States does not hold membership in the league, but there is no trouble in the United States, so far as concerns those difficulties which would necessarily and properly be adjusted by such a conference, beyond that which we have met through the conference in Washington. Land disarmament or reduction in Europe could certainly have held and should have held the attention of the league, and the absence of the United States, in my judgment, should not greatly deter, if at all, real positive results if that type of organization is to bring about any results of any kind. European conditions can well focus their attention.

My view of the difference, as I think very well evidenced by the results of the Washington conference as compared to the lack of results on the part of the subdivisions or subcommittees of the League of Nations, is simply because of the fact that this conference worked without supergovernments or constitutions or covenants; rather the representatives sat around the table and conferred as business men sit around the conference table and endeavor to reach conclusions on any subject or any problem they have before them, while under the covenant of the League of Nations the procedure, as we well know, is entirely different.

I believe the result of the Washington conference marks a new era in the settlement of international difficulties, and when differences have arisen, following the usual and ordinary exchange of diplomatic notes through the state departments of different countries, if that fails to bring about a solution, the calling together of representatives of the nations involved in the difficulty or the prospective misunderstanding, without any agreement before they enter into their negotiations, but conferring as representatives ready to give and take, as evidenced by the successful results of the Washington conference, will be the accepted method of settling international disputes.

I have no desire to take from our friends on the other side of the aisle any of their feeling of assurance as to the possible results of the future activities of the League of Nations. If it relieves their minds at all to bring into this debate the League of Nations, with its known failure of accomplishment in this direction during its existence of two or three years, they are certainly entitled to do so; but it would seem to me that the comparison itself of that deplorable lack of results with the definite accomplishments of the conference would make it of doubtful expediency.

I am, however, glad to see the disposition evidenced on the other side of the Chamber to at least join practically unanimously in the ratification of the pending treaty. It marks the commencement certainly of the recognition of a principle that competition between nations in building warships and ironclads is a policy of an age behind us. Perhaps it has not gone far enough, but the principle is certainly definitely established, and if we maintain the ratio of navies as provided under the conference agreement we shall certainly be in relatively the same position, or even a better one, than we were before the agreement, and the great burden of taxation will be materially relieved.

While referring briefly to that situation, I want it to be understood that I am one of those who believe most positively that with the 5-5-3 ratio, now that our Navy is to be parallel with and equivalent to the other great naval powers, it is our first duty and responsibility to maintain and keep to the pink of perfection the ratio of five allotted to us. The personnel necessary to properly man those ships must be provided, and we must also provide all the equipment necessary for the navy yards and all that is essential to maintain a Navy of the first class. The American people, while I believe they are heartily in favor of this mutual agreement to limit armament, are opposed to any reduction in personnel or appropriations necessary to keep our allotment of the 5-5-3 ratio up to the very maximum of efficiency.

While, in the ratification of the pending treaty, navy personnel is hardly the question before us, yet to me it would seem most unfortunate if as a result of a mutual limitation of armament we should feel that that involved also a lessening of the power of the Navy allotted to us by the agreement reached at the conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, yesterday, during the colloquy between the Senator from Alabama and myself, the Senator misapprehended my position in relation to this treaty. I am not opposed to it and shall vote for its ratification, but in so doing entertain the view that it will fail to accomplish all that is expected by many people. I stated in substance yesterday that the treaty does not presage the millenium and will prove in its application and operations a disappointment to the people of the United States, who have been led to believe that it, together with the other treaties formulated at the Washington conference, would bring about world disarmament and relieve the American people of all military and naval burdens.

That this treaty does possess some virtue is gladly conceded, and that it leaves much to be desired all must frankly confess. It does not deal with the question of land disarmament, nor with the entire question of naval disarmament; and there is serious doubt as to whether in dealing with only one factor of naval disarmament it has not accentuated the evils that exist and will be exaggerated by other factors.

Sufficient has already been said by Senators who have discussed this treaty to indicate that there will be but little, if any, reduction in the naval budget which the United States will be called upon to meet during the coming year, as well as during the immediate future. Indeed, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has just indicated, if I interpreted his remarks correctly, that the burden resulting from naval expenditures will be exceedingly onerous. The Senator from Alabama yesterday declared that for the coming year, and perhaps for several years, there would be no appreciable reduction in the naval expenditures of the United States.

Of course, the reason is obvious. The Washington conference dealt only with capital ships, and it only limited the number of capital ships to be constructed, but it did not limit other naval craft and agencies and instrumentalities to be employed in naval warfare. It did not deal with submarines or airplanes, or bombs, or naval warcraft of less than 10,000 tons. Indeed, the entire field of naval war is left unrestricted and unrestrained, except that branch which deals with capital ships.

With the marvelous developments in modern science and in the engines of destruction, both upon land and upon sea, it is manifest that the future, and the immediate future, will devise innumerable weapons to aid in carrying on naval warfare which may prove to be infinitely more destructive of human life and of the forces of belligerent powers than capital ships. It is also manifest that to restrict one naval weapon without any attempt to restrict others will direct attention to such other naval weapons, as well as to undeveloped fields.

I venture the prediction, Mr. President, that notwithstanding this treaty and the ratio of capital ships provided therein, the demands which will be made by the executive departments of the Government for the coming fiscal year will exceed $400,000,000. Congress, in my opinion, partly in response to the demands of the Navy Department, will vote appropriations approximating that amount. And there is but little prospect, unless other treaties are negotiated or the League of Nations is successful in its purposes and present activities, of the naval Budget of the United States for the next 10 years being less than $300,000,000 to $350,000,000 per annum. In other words, notwithstanding this treaty, the United States will, in my opinion, expend more each year for a number of years than it expended annually for many years prior to 1917. This treaty establishes a standard from which it will be difficult to depart. The ratio, if carried out, will involve stupendous appropriations upon the part of the United States, so that there is a possibility of its increasing in the aggregate rather than diminishing the naval costs of the United States. However, with all of its defects and imperfections, I can perceive some advantage in the treaty, and, as stated, will support it.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] seems disturbed because of the numerous allusions to the League of Nations. He seems to rest under the belief that the discussion of the league was projected into the debate by its devotees and by those who do not ascribe to the Washington conference a degree of perfection never before attained by human wisdom. I think the record will show that Senators on the other side of the aisle, who have been the proponents of the four-power pact, have not failed to conceal their hostility to the League of Nations. Directly or indirectly, they have attacked it and attempted to belittle its achievements. There has been an evident purpose to glorify the work of the Washington conference and to detract from the achievements of the Paris conference. The efforts to discredit the League of Nations have been, as I have followed the discussion, manifest. The purpose seems to have been to place the work of the Washington conference in juxtaposition to the League of Nations and claim for the former virtues and advantages to which the latter may lay no claim whatever.

I venture to suggest, however, that the pitiful efforts made by many of our Republican friends to discredit the League of Nations and its splendid achievements will not be welcomed by a majority of the American people or by the liberal sentiment and the progressive forces of the world. The League of Nations, notwithstanding the obstacles interposed to its success and notwithstanding the powerful opposition which it has encountered from the Republican administration and from many Republican leaders, is still a living and vital force throughout the world.

Undoubtedly the absence of the United States from the league has materially weakened it and has constituted an impediment to its more effective operation. Its record of achievements is, however, impressive, and challenges the admiration of all who desire world peace and seek world fellowship. The league will not, I sincerely hope, be destroyed by the Washington conference, although the alliance which results from the four-power pact may further weaken it. It is quite possible that the nations now belonging to the league may regard the alliance between the United States, Great Britain, Japan, and France as an attack upon the league and as designed to absolutely bring about its destruction. Of course, if this view should become universal and should be sincerely accepted by a large number of nations now supporting the league, the result upon the league would not only be unfortunate but, indeed, disastrous.

My principal opposition to the four-power treaty grew out of the fact that I believed that it would be regarded as an alliance and would provoke resentments and counteralliances; that it would be regarded by some nations as an assault upon the league by the four great powers, signatories to the treaty, and as the beginning of a war upon the league which would end only in its destruction. Believing as I do in the league—that is, in a world league, with the necessary provisions for conciliation, arbitration, disarmament, and the enforcement of the mandates and sanctions of the league—I view with disfavor any movement calculated to destroy the league or to devitalize it or to diminish the confidence of the people of the world in its work and in its beneficent purposes. I look with apprehension upon groups or alliances of nations, believing that other groups and other alliances may be formed, thus reviving the old system which has been discredited and which has brought so much of sorrow and woe to the world.

But returning to the treaty before us and its effect upon our naval expenditures, let me say that we appropriated for the current year approximately $500,000,000. That tax was enormous, and imposed a burden upon the American people which they ought not to be called upon to bear in peace times. For the coming fiscal year, notwithstanding this treaty, if we are to follow the views of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], the appropriation will not be greatly reduced. I make the prediction that Senators who urge enormous appropriations will resist all efforts made by Senators upon the floor to cut the naval expenses to reasonable limits.

When the Senator from Idaho was speaking a few moments ago I called attention to an article which discussetd the accomplishments of the Washington conference, and referred particularly to the treaty which is now before us. In view of the extravagant claims which have been made by partisan Republicans as to the work of the Washington conference, I desire to make further reference to the article which seems to point a rather different story.

The Senator from New Jersey has just stated that the achievements of the Washington conference were the greatest that the world had ever seen. Mr. President, I might say in passing that those who are acquainted with history can point to a half dozen conferences and congresses of nations where the results, so far as disarmament was concerned, were greater than will be the result of the ratification of this treaty which we are now considering.

The article to which I refer was written by Mr. Archibald Hurd, one of the greatest naval experts in the world, and appeared in the Fortnightly Review of January, 1922. It is entitled "Washington naval standards; war fleets of four million tons." He says:

What will be the influence of the naval agreement on the world's fleets? It will impose upon the maritime nations of the world what will come to be regarded as a liability to maintain warships of all types, of approximately 4,000,000 tons displacement, costing, roughly, £800,000,000; and unless amendments are accepted—

And there is no evidence of a disposition to accept amendments, let me add—it will set up a higher standard for submarines, placing upon each nation what amounts practically to an obligation to continue building submarines——

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Do I understand the Senator from Utah to have made the statement that many international conferences in the past had accomplished greater results in the matter of the limitation of naval armaments than had been accomplished by the Washington conference?

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Jersey understood the Senator from Utah correctly, but I have not time to go into that question now.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator enlighten us by stating when the conferences which he has in mind were held?

Mr. KING. If the Senator will do me the honor, when I discuss the other treaties, to listen to me I shall try to enlighten him, although I do not know how successful I shall be.

Mr. EDGE. I should think that now would be a particularly appropriate time, inasmuch as we are about to vote on the subject.

Mr. KING. The Senator, of course, may indicate the line of argument which he desires to pursue for himself, but I decline to permit him to prescribe the line of argument which I shall follow.

Mr. EDGE. I bow to the Senator's privilege.

Mr. KING. Mr. Hurd, in his article, further proceeds, completing the sentence when I was interrupted by the Senator from New Jersey:

in opposition to the whole spirit of the American notes to Germany during the war, and the naval clauses of the peace treaty, which called upon Germany to surrender all her submarines and to undertake to build no more of that description. The conference, in short, will result in an inconsiderable reduction in the number and size of surface vessels, but an expansion of the submarine flotillas. In the face of these facts it has been suggested that the Washington conference is bringing about "naval disarmament," and that navies are going to be practically abolished.

That is the propaganda which has been conducted in the United States. The author continues:

On examination it must become apparent that it is doing little more than varying the factors of naval power, subtracting from the surface tonnage of the world by scrapping obsolescent capital ships, while adding to its submarine tonnage, and checking what might have proved a most ruinous rivalry in naval power expressed in terms of super-dreadnoughts, costing anything from £7,000,000 to £10,000,000 each.

There is the crux of the situation. Instead of spending the large sums which in the past we have expended for super-dreadnoughts, and which the United States had proposed to continue to expend in the future for capital ships, possibly larger sums will be devoted to the construction of submarines, aircraft, and other weapons of offensive and defensive warfare. In other words, as suggested by Mr. Hurd—there will be a transference of expenditures from capital ships to various other kinds of instrumentalities for naval warfare.

As Mr. Hurd states—

there are various factors in naval warfare. The United States has very foolishly been emphasizing capital ships and ignored to too great an extent undersea warcraft and aerial warcraft.

Our naval board has pursued reactionary policies rather than progressive ones. It has stubbornly followed the 1916 program, calling for hundreds of millions of capital ships, notwithstanding the fact that the war demonstrated that there were other important factors which challenge the supremacy of the capital ship.

As Senators know, Great Britain built no capital ships during the closing years of the war, nor has she built any since, and the same is true of France. As intimated by Mr. Hurd, the Washington conference deals with a factor in naval warfare, to wit, capital ships, the utility of which, in view of modern science and aerial warfare and undersea warfare, may be seriously, if not successfully, called into question.

The Senator from Idaho has just called attention to the fact that one nation is already devising a superior type of submarine. This type is much larger, and the submarines will have a wider cruising radius and greater carrying capacity. They will, indeed, have greater speed and will constitute formidable warcraft. Undoubtedly they will make more uncertain the value of capital ships for war purposes.

The naval experts in other nations are devising new types of warcraft, some operating upon the surface and some underneath the surface. Undoubtedly there will be remarkable developments in submarine warcraft, particularly since there has been a limitation in the use of capital ships. Undoubtedly Great Britain, France, and Japan, and perhaps the United States, will spend much more money in the construction of submarines and smaller naval craft than they would have expended except for this treaty. And so, as some writers are now insisting, the effect of the present treaty will merely be to divert some of the funds employed in the construction of battleships to the construction of other naval craft, and the net result, so far as saving is concerned, will be inappreciable.

Last Friday, in the House of Commons, the British air minister presented a report to Parliament showing the importance of aircraft, not only in land but in naval warfare, and made a strong appeal for large appropriations for the military and naval air-service branch of the Government. He referred to the importance of aerial craft for military purposes, both offensively and defensively, directing attention to the importance of developing aerial warfare and to the great work which had been done by aircraft not only upon land but upon sea. He also alluded to the efficacy of aircraft in the revolutionary movement in South Africa, whereby a few airships dispersed hundreds of armed revolutionists and enabled the loyal troops to quickly quell the revolutionary outbreak.

Mr. Hurd proceeds:

The Hughes scheme was also exposed to the legitimate criticism because it allotted to each of the three powers a large tonnage of submarines, thus raising the cruiser problem in acute form, since the cruiser, in association with small craft, is the antidote to the submarine. Mr. Balfour at the outset made it clear to the conference that the British delegation would support a proposal for the abolition of submarines, or, failing that, would welcome an understanding limiting the aggregate tonnage of each power, as well as the size of submarines which each power might be allowed to build. It at once became apparent that certain maritime countries, weak in large surface craft, would regard with disfavor any agreement which restricted their freedom to build submarines. It was suggested that the British delegation were impelled by the very weakness of the position of the British Isles in relation to supplies of food and raw materials to take a biased view of the problem.

You ignore, it was declared in effect, the needs of those States with limited funds for naval defense, which can not afford to build many surface craft—battleships, battle cruisers, light cruisers, and destroyers—and who have welcomed the submarine as offering to them an effective and cheap means of providing for their defense. The submarine is the antidote to the capital ships, and we can not agree to its excommunication.

He further says, after examining the program which was laid down by Secretary Hughes and the ratio of 5-5-3:

These alterations do not vitiate any of the arguments in the preceding pages of this article, but, on the contrary, reinforce the contention that the influence of the naval agreement upon naval expenditure in this country as well as elsewhere will not be considerable.

He makes the further observation:

In these circumstances not only will the adoption of "piracy" in the next war remain a possibility—

Speaking of submarines and their use—

but the suspicion that attack may again be made upon sea-borne commerce by "the assassins of the sea" may lead to a general movement for arming merchant ships, besides imposing upon the naval powers with considerable mercantile marines the heavy responsibility of maintaining large numbers of patrol craft.

In other words, Mr. Hurd sees the use of submarines enlarged and emphasized, an increase in their production and use, the necessity of larger expenditures for patrol craft, for submarine chasers, for scout cruisers, and for other important and costly weapons of war.

The main influence for good which the naval agreement will exert, if the submarine menace can be laid—

But, of course, it is obvious from his pages that it can not be laid—

will be the elimination of all idea of naval rivalry and the creation of a new spirit in relation to the armaments of the sea. That it will result in considerable naval economies, apart from the sums which might have been expended in the construction of new capital ships, is an anticipation which, as has been shown, rests upon no foundation.

It is clear, Mr. President, that Mr. Hurd does not expect important economies from the Washington conference or any material alleviation from the burdens resulting from the construction of naval warcraft. We know that France intends to construct larger and better submarines. It has been stated by numerous persons, some of whom are naval experts, that the submarine is the weapon which places the small state—at least for defensive purposes—upon a plane of substantial equality with the great state, and that with the development of submarines and aircraft an offensive naval war is rendered more difficult.

Admiral Sims, as well as other great naval experts, has repeatedly declared that it would be impossible for Great Britain to bring her capital ships across the Atlantic and make war upon the United States, or for the United States to send its war fleet to the Asiatic coast to make war upon Japan or any Asiatic power. As a result of submarines and aircraft and bombs and torpedoes, the greatest naval experts in the world have revised their judgment as to the value of capital ships, and many have declared that the day of the capital ship has passed. Without expressing any opinion upon that matter, it is obvious that with swift scouts and large cruisers and submarines, with a radius of several thousand miles; with airplane carriers and improved airships which may drop bombs upon warcraft; with the perfection achieved in the sowing of the sea with bombs and mines, which proved destructive of great war vessels, battleships are not as formidable as they formerly were; and it is clear that with the limitation in the construction of battleships large amounts will be devoted to the construction of other instrumentalities of naval warfare. Mr. Hurd has very much reason for the conclusions which he has drawn and the convictions which he has expressed.

Mr. President, I have before me the Fortnightly Review of February, 1922, which contains an article entitled "Evasions of Washington," by Mr. Lancelot Lawton. Speaking of the Washington conference, he says it—> has changed very little the territorial arrangements of the Far East. From a strategical point of view none of the powers will be at all inconvenienced. Great Britain retains Hongkong; France has Saigon, with its splendid anchorage of Camranh Bay; while Japan's favored position in Manchuria and Mongolia is actually strengthened by formal reaffirmation and recognition. But what about the limitation of naval armaments, it will be asked—surely in this respect the achievement of the conference was immense? To which I make reply: "Take up a map and glance for a moment at the vast expanse of the Pacific, and you will realize that Japan, situated as she is in the remote east, with China lying at her very doorway, occupies an almost unassailable position." In view of these geographical realities the ratio of battleships was not so important to her as many would have us believe. So long as she possesses an adequate fleet of submarines and supply of airplanes her position is as near to being impregnable as any position could well be.

> Washington, therefore, has not achieved quite so much as has been imagined. Its success is only spectacular and superficial; the Pacific problem remains, in fact, unsolved; and the evil day of reckoning has merely been postponed. One can not help feeling that Washington has not even grasped what the Pacific problem really is. This was hardly to be wondered at. Statesmen wait on public opinion, and public opinion in turn waits on statesmen. Who leads and who is led it would be hard to determine. Hence things move slowly, and it is only when we are actually face to face with a great crisis that we bestir ourselves—often, alas, too late.

He further says:

> The Japanese, who, unlike the western powers, are not saturated with sentiment, perceive where they are going. They have been willing to agree to a reduction of naval armaments which does not impair in the slightest degree their unassailable position in the Far East. At the same time they continue to maintain what is undoubtedly the most powerful army in the world. In so far as the Washington conference permits them to effect naval economies, it will relieve their internal difficulties, which were certainly becoming rather pressing. For this the Japanese must be profoundly grateful to President Harding. But to speak quite plainly, they have given up nothing that matters. Their secret military and economic agreements with China remain, and they still possess a colossal army, with a navy strong enough to insure against all comers the safe transport of troops to the Asiatic continent.
> * * * * * * *

He further says:

> The four-power agreement to maintain the status quo in the Pacific entirely ignores the wrongs of the past and realities of the present. It is merely a device of the diplomatists to justify all the previous hopes that were centered upon Washington. But it is neither a solution nor even the beginning of a solution——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from what is the Senator reading?

Mr. KING. From an article in the February number of the Fortnightly Review by Mr. Lancelot Lawton. This writer declares the work of the Washington conference to be spectacular and superficial. I have not time to read the entire article, Mr. President, but a perusal of it will not be reassuring to those who attribute such supernatural qualities to the work of the Washington conference and ascribe to it invisible other powers to heal the nations and to destroy the hard visage of war. In my opinion, there is much loose talk of the flamboyant and, I was about to say, "flapdoodle" character relative to the accomplishments of the conference.

It were better to describe the work of the conference as it actually is and seek to appraise it at its true value. Already the minds of the people have been inflamed and their imaginations wrought up to the highest point in expectation of universal peace and a relief from the burdens of naval and military armament. Some Senators who are now so loud in their declamatory utterances as to the transcendent virtues of the conference will have their faith and, indeed, their sincerity tested in the next few months, and particularly when the naval and Army bills are brought before the Senate for discussion.

In the Saturday Review of February 11, 1922, appears an article entitled "The Results of Washington." The article is rather gloomy and pessimistic and sees but unimportant gains by reason of the conference. It declares that the conference yielded to the demands of the French for a huge fleet of submarines when the British proposed the total abolition of submarines, although their own submarine fleet was the best in existence. It refers to the action of the conference in declaring a submarine tax upon merchant vessels as unlawful, and then states that the provision "will certainly be disregarded." The writer proceeds to state that if France builds a great fleet of submarines Britain will be compelled to build antisubmarine craft in proportion, and thus incur great expense.

This language is also employed:

> Owing to the action again of France, the arms conference was a complete failure in bringing about a reduction of land armaments—certainly, viewed in all implications, as great a matter as any that came before the conference. It may be said, however, without unfairness, that America was concerned much more in a reduction of naval than of land armaments.

The article further declares that—> the conference failed to take really effective steps to protect China from encroachments. It passed at an early stage Senator Root's four pious resolutions about maintaining unimpaired the sovereignty and territorial integrity of China—resolutions which did no more than echo former statements of the powers, and can easily be broken by an aggressive power. The same may be said of the nine-power treaty which reaffirms the doctrine of the "open door," and leaves China to herself. Another failure was shown in giving in to Japan's demand to cancel the fourth of the Hughes resolutions, allowing the board of reference, which is to be set up, to examine the past as well as the future concessions and agreements made by China with the other powers. Japan thus secured by default her extensive claims in Manchuria and other former concessions of the greatest value.

In conclusion the article says:

> To sum up, the truth about the conference is that if its conclusions are indorsed by the Senate some of the problems of the Pacific may be considered as settled for a time, but others, and not the least important, remain.

Mr. President, I have not called attention to these articles in any critical spirit, but to show the point of view of others who have examined the work of the conference with great interest and with a desire to discover what was really accomplished. It is disquieting to those who expected naval disarmament upon the part of the nations participating in the conference to learn that perhaps but little saving will result from the treaties accomplished and that "factors," using the expression of Mr. Hurd, of naval warfare not in the past regarded as of such paramount importance will now be emphasized and developed to the highest possible degree of perfection.

It is known that not only in the United States but in many lands research work is being done with a view to improving aircraft as well as submarines. Scientific men and experts are giving their attention to all forms of aircraft and to the production of the most deadly explosives. The Washington conference imposed no restrictions upon aerial warfare. In my opinion, a remarkable impetus will be given to the development of aircraft and, as I have stated, submarines much more deadly and effective than any heretofore dreamed of will be produced, so that the economies supposed to have resulted from limitation in the construction of capital ships will be lost in the expenditures for various other engines of destruction, both upon land and upon sea.

Lord Percy Scott, Admiral Sims, Admiral Fullam, and other naval experts in the United States and elsewhere have stated, in effect, that the primacy of the battleship had come to an end. Experiments recently conducted by the Navy Department show the deadly effects of bombs dropped from the air upon or in the vicinity of the most powerful warships. There has been too much emphasis laid by our Naval Board upon the capital ship. The surface craft have been emphasized, and the fact that naval warfare must be conducted upon three planes has not been always in the minds of our naval constructors and those determining our naval policies. The Washington conference deals with the heavy craft of one plane, but does not deal with the other two planes—under the sea and over the sea. Unless other treaties are negotiated, and unless the League of Nations brings about a limitation in naval armament, there will be remarkable development in airplanes and in submarines. The scout cruiser with the swiftness of light will be developed and other water craft of a deadly nature will be developed to take the place of the capital ship.

The hope which I have of future reduction in armament rests largely upon the League of Nations. If the powers who have signed the treaty before us shall immediately signify their desire to cooperate with the League of Nations and work with it for the purpose of bringing about world disarmament, then the work of the conference may be of far-reaching importance and benefit to the world. It is to be hoped that there will be no attempt by the signatories to the four-power pact to set up a rival organization or to cripple or disparage or weaken the league.
